There are even Judaica-themed photo albums; just slip in a few pictures of the event to share with anyone whose presence made the day special – or with those who weren't able to be there with you.

But even if you're not planning a major simchah right now, a visit to Israeli Source usually pays off at this time of year.

With the lowest prices in town on Chanukah needs – including partyware such as plates and tablecloths, gifts, books, toys and crafts – it should be your first stop.

"Why spend more than you have to?" says Elnekave.

At Israeli Source, you won't.

For style and comfort, Naots are the answer

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

A good pair of shoes can make an enormous difference to your day, but particularly, to your party or special event.

Just ask Natasha Lisssoos, general manager of Solemates Inc. The company, with eight stores across Canada, is the only distributor of Naot shoes from Israel.

What makes them so special, says Lisssoos, is their orthopedic foot bed, which is made of cork covered by a layer of latex and suede.

"It provides mid-arch support and metatarsal arch support, and the cork acts as a superb shock absorber for every step you take, distributing the weight of your body evenly."

Anatomical footbed moulds to the shape of your foot

she says. "In this way, it supports the body biomechanically from the feet upwards."

The anatomical footbed moulds to the shape of your foot "much like a footprint we leave while walking in the sand," she adds. Naot shoes' deep heel indentation with padding also helps protect the heel bone.

Naot shoes have been a real blessing to people who require orthotics, she reflects.

"Last year we released a pump line called PrimaBella with a removable foot bed," she says. "It looks like a dress pump, but you can put your own orthotic in it. The removable foot bed is something Naot invented, and it has allowed people to wear their orthotics in Naot's funky sandal styles and trendy shoes."

Founded in 1942 by members of Kibbutz Naot Mordechai, Naot has become an international success story in its ability to represent the perfect marriage of comfort and style.

All its shoes are handmade in Israel using Italian leathers and are made of latex innersole covered in suede to help absorb moisture. In Canada, they are priced between $150 and $300 a pair. They are durable, lightweight and have removable footpads for easy cleaning. Best of all, Naots can be relied upon to leave your feet pain free yet glamorous, no matter what the occasion.

Look out for rich colours and lavish designs this year, says Lisssoos. "We have volcanic reds, browns, metallic blacks, rich hazelnut and blues in fashion right now, and next year the blues will be even stronger," she says.

Solemates has four stores in Toronto - Naot on Queen Street West; Naot Footwear in Thornhill; Prairie Dog at Bathurst Street and Eglinton Avenue; Naot Footwear in North York, on Leslie Street.

There are two stores in Montreal, one in Calgary and one in Vancouver.

Atlantis offers city's most picturesque venue

Ontario Place closed, but 'we are not going anywhere'

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

Ontario Place might be closed, but Atlantis, the jewel of the Ontario Place grounds and one of Toronto's most picturesque venues, is still very much alive with four ballrooms for simchahs ranging from six to 1,500 guests.

In fact, said Darren Bryant, director of marketing, "we recently underwent a complete renovation of our four ballrooms and installed a state-of-the-art audio-visual system that can cater to any event complete with an exterior screen that will rival any drive-in theatre."

"We have dance floors suspended over the water, panoramic views of the city's skyline and the capability to have a dramatic 30-foot pyrotechnic waterfall that will cascade down the side of your ballroom windows."

But don't let the audio-visual perks distract you from the stunning natural surroundings of this venue.

"Literally perched up on 70-foot stilts out in the middle of Lake Ontario, Atlantis has breathtaking views of the city skyline as well as the marina," Bryant said.

Just 10 minutes from downtown and accessible from all major highways, Atlantis can provide all the major necessities for a function.

"Each event is assigned to an event details manager, who oversees all the small details so the guest doesn't have to, to create a flawless event," Bryant said.

Atlantis, which provides its own leading-edge audio-visual equipment, can also connect you to all of the essential services, such as floral, photography, décor, hotels, DJs and more.

It also provides plenty of options when it comes to catering, including kosher. "We have our own on-site kosher kitchen," Bryant said. "Our in-house caterer is Zuchter Berk, who we've worked with for years."

Atlantis also offers four choices of ballroom, so you're sure to find the ideal space, with the flexibility you may need.

"Our rooms can be combined, including our rooftop patio, which has the best view in the city, overlooking Lake Ontario," Bryant said.

The smaller ballrooms, such as the Skyline (overlooking the city lights) and the Lakeview (which overlooks Lake Ontario and the Cinesphere) can start off your event with cocktails before you relocate to the Metropolitan or Trillium, the grand ballrooms.

"Guests can also have multiple themes in each of these rooms," said Bryant, "to create different ambiances that will set your event apart from the rest."

Top Choice award winner for the best event facility in Toronto in 2012, Atlantis makes it easy to set up an event.

"The booking process... is a breeze," Bryant said. "We have purposely kept it very simple for our guests."

So forget the dire headlines about Ontario Place: Atlantis is ready for your event and continues to flourish. "Our lease is good until 2029, so we are not going anywhere," Bryant said.

"There seems to be a lot of misconceptions out there with people thinking we are closed because we're on the same property... Atlantis is very much open for business, and in no way have we been affected by Ontario Place's closure."

Registry makes gift-giving simple at Cayne's

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Everyone wants to buy the bride and groom the perfect gift. But sometimes it's hard to know what items the couple needs and almost impossible to guess what other guests are purchasing, making this a challenging task indeed.

Cayne's (cayneshousewares.com, 905-764-1188, which opened 26 years ago, is a 25,000-square-foot warehouse located at 112 Doncaster Ave. in Thornhill.

Cayne's sells products to meet every household need including small kitchen appliances, dinnerware, bakeware, area rugs, bedding, linens and even humidifiers and air conditioners.

"We are a destination store that fills all your household needs with sale prices every single day," said owner Jerry Cayne.

Cayne's began its gift registry program because brides stocking up on household needs would ask why their guests had to purchase the same products from department and large chain stores for higher prices than Cayne's offered.

"We could see the need for that service," Cayne said. "We are all about giving people the best quality product at the lowest prices around."

The first step to set up a gift registry at Cayne's is to make an appointment with one of the sales staff.

"A professional, someone who works with the products every day, will help guide your decisions and give you suggestions. They will explain the different products to avoid any confusion or disappointment," he said.

The store's sales staff will also ask each bride or groom registering for gifts a series of questions to help choose products that will fit their lifestyle.

"We're not in the business of selling you products you don't want or need," Cayne said.

For example, if a couple has already been living together, then they likely have the basic kitchen equipment and we can guide them toward products that are more unique. Or someone might have small children they want to cook with, or they might be an avid baker. Everyone has different household needs and we help them figure out what "those needs" are.

After the bride and groom choose the gifts they want to add to their registry, the list is put into the store system and guests can purchase from it. As gifts are purchased, the list is updated to ensure that there are no duplicates.

"The best part of buying someone a gift at Cayne's is that you can get a better present and spend less money than you would at any department store," said Cayne.

'We are a destination store that fills all your household needs with sale prices every single day'

The most popular gifts include food processors, stand mixers, coffee makers and toaster ovens. "These are classic products and they never go out of style."

Cayne's is always updating its inventory to keep up with current trends.

"We have all the new colours and styles," Cayne said. "We stock only the best brands, including KitchenAid and Cuisinart."

For those who prefer to shop without leaving home,

Cayne's offers online shopping. Customers in any major Canadian city can expect their products to be shipped the next day. And just in case you change your mind, Cayne's has a 30-day return policy. They will also exchange any products that are damaged while still under company warranty. "Customer service is the most important part of our business."

Go beyond Ashkenazi classics

Jennifer M. MacLeod

Looking for a simchah with a unique flavour? Owner Marla Kay is dishing up kosher food "with a spin" at The Avenue (905-669-0777, theavenuebanquethall.com, info@theavenuebanquethall.com), a stunning centrally located venue near Dufferin Street and Steeles Avenue, at 1600 Steeles Ave. W.

Since The Avenue opened in 2010, Zeese Kosher Catering, its kosher division, has done a booming business in creating elegant simchahs and offering food that highlights a family's taste and cultural preferences.

Think beyond Ashkenazi classics: from Indian to Chinese to Mediterranean delights, all the tastes of The Avenue are made on-site. "Everything is very, very fresh," says Kay. "We don't order anything pre-made."

The Avenue's on-site chef is trained in East Indian cuisine, which has been a hit within the local community of Indian Jews and others desperate for variety. Chicken tikka masala, cauliflower aloo gobi and fresh naan flatbreads offer an authentic taste of India.

"They've told us the only other place they can find authentic [kosher] East Indian food is in France," says Kay. Curried dishes are also popular with The Avenue's large base of South African clients.

Part of her secret is a change she's made to buying all her spices from Israel. "None of them are sourced in Canada now." That makes a difference in freshness, which translates into luscious flavours, whether for Indian, Middle Eastern or North American-style dishes. Beyond Indian dishes, other chefs are often brought in to prepare various specialty items, meaning the sky's the limit.

"We have Chinese chefs that come in – they do authentic Chinese food. It's not the Sunday-night chicken balls. They do the authentic stuff. We buy all the ingredients kosher, they come into the kosher kitchen and they do it. We do the same thing with our sushi – we have an authentic sushi chef who... does kosher sushi in our kitchen."

Kosher kitchen available
Capacity up to 100
100-300 capacity
Over 300
Wheelchair Accessible

Under Badatz Toronto supervision, Zeese also offers off-site kosher catering for events at other banquet halls, golf clubs and other venues, as well as smaller functions such as shivah meals, corporate events and kosher barbecues.

"Several rabbis have come in to taste our foods," says Kay, "and they can't get over our food... We're keeping the highest standards of kashrut and giving them a product they're so excited about."

Kay says customers have been blown away not only "by the quality of our food; they love our service," but also by the space, which is exclusively theirs for their entire event.

"When you book The Avenue, it's just your party. You don't hear any music through the walls – it's just you. [Normally]... when it comes to kosher, they're in the multiplex halls."

A wedding and party planner for more than 30 years before opening The Avenue, Kay says, "I've been in the industry a long time." She uses her expertise to offer hosts the benefits of a venue and a party planner in one. At The Avenue, she offers two rooms: a smaller ballroom that will seat up to 100 people and a larger ballroom that can seat up to 450.

The fluidity and elegance of simchahs that flow from space to space is a highlight of The Avenue. The smaller ballroom can accommodate the ceremony, then guests can come out for cocktails and hors d'oeuvres before transitioning through Tiffany glass doors into the main ballroom.

"They have the entire venue to themselves... They don't have other people walking into their hors d'oeuvres."

Along with this convenience, The Avenue is also centrally located, with plenty of free parking, close to hotels and major highways.

Today's families are more diverse than previous generations, and often, blending traditions means blending food tastes, creating a custom menu as unique as the hosts themselves. But regardless of personal taste, it always comes down to two simple factors: "They love the quality of our food, they love our service."

Get high quality for less at Deblins

Vicki Tobianah
Special to The CJN

If you host parties often, you probably know what it's like to receive the same types of gifts over and over again: a bottle of wine to add to your collection, a set of glasses that don't fit in your cupboard, or a fancy dessert dish.

But this holiday season, getting a little more creative won't break the bank, says Sari Rajsky of Deblins Linens 39 Orfus Rd., 416-782-2910; 7979 Weston Rd., 905-264-0975; www.deblins.com in Toronto.

"Monogrammed towels can be a perfect gift for a dinner party host," said Rajsky. "A very popular item for hostess gifts are monogrammed paper guest towels. They go equally well in the powder room or on the buffet table. And they're personalized, so they make a great gift."

Established in 1977, Deblins is a one-stop shop for beautiful bath, bed and table linens and accessories.

"My husband's parents came from South Africa and they had a linen store there called The Linen Chest," said Rajsky.

After they moved to Canada, the Chitiz family opened a small store in the Sheraton Centre: Debby's Linens. Named after its founder and matriarch, affectionately known as Mrs. C. Debby's Linens became "Deblins."

From the humble beginnings of a single small store, the business grew to include seven additional stores.

The smaller stores were later replaced by today's two big-box, department-style stores.

The change paid off. When you walk into Deblins, you're surrounded by more than 30 fully-made beds, about six dinner tables completely set, and an abundance of other home and party essentials: five shelves stacked from floor to ceiling with different types of pillows and duvets, and an entire wall devoted to placemats and tablecloths.

Indeed, it feels as if you've embarked on a voyage of discovery in your own never-ending home — room after exquisite room — without any clutter or mess. That's the vision Rajsky and her team wanted to achieve. At Deblins, the abundance of options is laid out so simply and organized so logically that picking out the items you need for the perfect party — or a new home — is a walk in the park.

"We're known for our customer service. Our staff is very, very patient. Usually, a staff person will walk around with the customer and make suggestions," she said. "People are generally looking for a little guidance. I'm certainly like that."

Their expertise in helping customers choose the right gift is invaluable. With more than 30 years in the business, they know how to help couples plan their gift registry.

"Most of the people who come in for a bridal registry are looking to give their bedroom a whole new look," said Rajsky. "If they're getting a different-sized bed, for example, they want to start off with new sheets, a new mattress protector, new everything. Often they will upgrade from what they had before."

But before couples dish out big bucks for the season's latest trend — "they said purple was going to be really big last season, this year they say orange" — Rajsky recommends a more cost-efficient approach: neutrals for the cornerstone registry items and complimentary colours for accent pieces and accessories. Guests on a budget can then purchase the accessories, with closer family and friends buying the bigger-ticket items.

"We find that we can often accessorize so even if you're going for a more neutral look — grey has been big for the past couple years in the bedroom, and will continue to be — you can accent that with a throw pillow or other accessory in whatever colour is hot at the moment."

Bathroom accessories are popular registry items at De-

with all your linens needs

blins Linens because they have 15 different lines of towels in about 25 different colours, Rajsky said.

Deblins carries an extensive range of bed and bath linens made of fine fabrics from around the world. Some of the goods made with these fabrics are manufactured in Canada. One of the best sellers is the Legend tablecloth from Revelle, with fabric woven in Israel. Legend comes in much wider dimensions than the standard tablecloth, making it a popular item for couples who are purchasing oversized tables.

Some come up to 198 inches long, while others are designed to fit unique shapes, such as a 72-inch square table or an oval table. You can order many of their designs in custom lengths and widths.

And when you're choosing a gift for a close friend or family member, a custom tablecloth for the couple with the extra-long dinner table who loves to entertain — or stain-release placemats for the family with young children — just shows how much thought you've put into it, even without spending an inordinate amount of money.

"Customers really appreciate the opportunity to buy quality merchandise at less than they're accustomed to paying," said Rajsky.

"Buying quality for friends and family says you care. We're happy to help them do that cost-effectively."

"That way the customer meets me a few times, and everything is done for them – the DJ, invitations, linen choices, menu selections, celebration cake and centrepieces."

These packages are available at both Pickle Barrel party venues. The Rose Room, located downstairs from the original Pickle Barrel restaurant at 5941 Leslie St., can accommodate parties of 60 to 120 people.

The second banquet hall, located at the Markville Shopping Centre at McCowan Road and Highway 7, is the site of a former Walmart store.

The hall, named the Harold Soupcoff Room in memory of the late co-founder of the Pickle Barrel, has its own entrance. Murray says the room holds up to 210 people comfortably with a DJ or a band.

The Pickle Barrel recently upgraded the Rose Room. "We have brand-new chairs, and it's all redecorated. Very shortly, we will be refurbishing Markville as well."

She points out that the party packages have also been updated. "We have totally revamped the menu. We changed the pricing and some of it is lower."

And the Pickle Barrel's party packages have always been well priced, she adds. "It's one of the best deals in town. It's hard to beat our prices."

The bar and bat mitzvah packages start at $5,500 for 75 guests at both locations. The buffet has several hot entrées, salads and side-dish selections, and a delectable dessert station. This package offers a premium buffet that includes barbecue chicken, chicken fingers, two pastas and a deli carving station with a choice of pastrami, smoked meat or corned beef. You can replace the deli at the carving station with prime rib or salmon for an additional $5 per person.

All the packages can be enhanced and adapted for an additional cost, says Murray.

"You can add some wow to your party by ordering hors d'oeuvres, a waffle or sundae bar, novelty giveaways, dancers, candy floss and popcorn machines and or a photo booth."

Capacity up to 100 ☒

She stresses that the buffet meal is not the only option.

"We can also do a four-course sit-down dinner with complete table service, but the price is slightly different. It's about $5 more a person."

Murray says the brunch menu is always a big draw.

"We offer a full dairy menu with items like blintzes, smoked salmon, bagels, and we do an omelette bar."

Desserts at the Pickle Barrel are also a big hit, she says.

"We do cookies, pastries, mini-cupcakes or plated cakes like cheesecake or chocolate fudge. The cheesecakes are the most popular, but the chocolate mousse bombe is a close second."

Murray recommends the Pickle Barrel for engagement parties, showers, special occasion brunches such as baby namings and milestone birthdays, as well as corporate events.

"It's the best price around for the quality of food and entertainment."

Surprises delight clients at Simcha Catering

'We make everything in house' at Chateau Le Jardin

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Clients don't always know what they're looking for, says chef Steve Ricci of Simcha Catering, the exclusive kosher caterer for the Chateau Le Jardin Conference and Event Centre (905-851-2200, lejardin.com). And even if they come in knowing exactly what they want, after working with Ricci to plan their menu, they come away amazed that everything tasted so much better than they'd expected.

Ricci aims to create what he calls "tradition, with nouveau style." European-trained with more than seven years' experience at Prego Della Piazza and three years' at the Windsor Arms, where he began dealing with kosher events, Ricci keeps abreast of food trends to share the best with Simcha's clients.

He travels extensively, taking off for California to meet with a group of kosher and non-kosher caterers at a winery, event or down to New York for a food event there.

"We're working closely with kosher caterers in the U.S. and here with the rabbis we work with," through Badatz Toronto, its kosher supervisory agency, to take kosher food to a new level – finding uncommon ingredients that can be easily incorporated into a kosher menu.

Instead of a run-of-the-mill roasted chicken entrée, for instance, he might "switch it," using the distinctive flavour of pommery mustard, and adding a Canadian wild rice stuffing. For a recent wedding, he prepared a house-cured smoked salmon with crumbled toasted challah, chopped gherkins and a horseradish aioli with a parsley salad.

"Everyone thinks of a smoked-salmon dish," he says, "but we take it to a new level."

Put yourself in Ricci's capable hands, and you'll get unexpected twists that can take a menu from ordinary – food you'll enjoy – to extraordinary – food you'll remember for a lifetime.

"Right now we're doing a tasting of a little braised short rib with a horseradish pureed potato, with seasonal vegetables and a red-wine jus."

Another typical wintertime meal might include mustard-crusted roasted chicken breast served on a squash ragout, filled with parsnips and wild mushrooms.

Since 1985, Chateau Le Jardin has hosted weddings, anniversaries, holiday parties, conferences, seminars and meetings in a gilded, jewel-box venue boasting large private foyers with plenty of natural light, soaring 30-foot ceilings, walkout courtyards and ornate fireplaces.

And for the last six years, the venue has hosted kosher events, with the addition of Simcha Catering.

The company also runs kosher events at Capitol Event Theatre on Yonge Street north of Eglinton Avenue. "It's a beautiful, historical venue," says president and general manager Carlo Parentela. Renovated 10 years ago, the Capitol holds up to 1,000 people for a reception, and up to 250 for a sit-down dinner.

With its new 30,000-square-foot banquet facility and French-inspired décor, Chateau Le Jardin – located at 8440 Highway 27, just north of Highway 7 in Woodbridge – can accommodate up to 1,300 guests for a banquet. For corporate events, there's 38,000 square feet of function space, 25,000 square feet of exhibit space and 600 ground-level complimentary parking spots.

Parentela says that beyond adapting classic flavours, Simcha's fresh, high-quality foods also make a difference.

"We make everything in house" (except baked goods). "All our sauces are made in house. We don't buy anything in jars – zero... We don't buy anything in a jar or in a box."

As for keeping up with culinary trends, Ricci maintains the company's edge by travelling regularly, recently visiting the Ritz-Carlton Hotel in San Francisco to observe a kosher event. "We keep evolving... that's what we look forward to doing."

It's the only way to keep surprising and delighting clients, one simchah – make that Simcha! – at a time.

Photographer evokes warmth, while digital shots offer flexibility

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

After a simchah is over, it's the photos that will help you share the memories for years to come. That's why choosing a good photographer is so important.

Alex Himell, owner of Platinum Studios, has a passion for putting people in pictures – a passion that helps him capture those memorable moments.

A high-quality print album is essential

"You have to be involved, to a certain extent, in order to get those awesome photos, and not be intrusive, but you have to be able to grab the smiles or capture the serious moments, under the chupah or up at the Torah," Himell said.

He established Platinum Studios in 1998 and has been working with his passion ever since.

"I've always been doing photography," said the Ryerson University graduate. "Since I established Platinum Studios, I've been involved in the community do-ate and capture their family history forever in their albums," Himell added. "It's that interaction that I love."

The process begins when the customer contacts Platinum Studios, which Himell recommends doing anywhere from six months to a year in advance.

"There's always a consult, whether on the phone or if they come in," he said. "Usually, they come in and can look at the albums."

"You kind of match up what style of photography you'd like to have for the event and the style of the album."

One of the more popular choices these days is a "storytelling" album. "That's the new thing," Himell said. "In the old days, you'd have a single image per page, and now it is multiple images per page."

"People love the cool designs and the different things we can do because of digital [photography and design]."

Nowadays, all photos are shot digitally, which is a great advantage. "Technology's allowed us to do some wonderful things in regards to capturing people's memories," Himell said.

There are still old-fashioned expectations, however, and a high-quality print album is essential. "In the end, people still want that professional approach of having a retouched album, but we do offer both platforms of a digital and print book as well."

Himell's found a simple strategy to make photophobic folks more comfortable – just chat for a while. "A lot of people are very receptive to just talking," Himell said. "They forget that it's a photo shoot... just talking, cracking jokes, and posing them while you're talking, that's part of the magic of the process."

"It's that interaction between the photographer and the subject that relaxes people," he added. "Before you know it, you have an album and an awesome portrait up on the wall."

Himell has fun with what he does, and it's allowed him to come up with some interesting shots.

"People like something different, like if you grab the bar-mitzvah boy or bat-mitzvah girl and put them on a couch in the middle of the street," he said. "It's different from the usual. Let's take a picture by the tree or in the tree."

"Sometimes it's in the posing, doing something fun," said Himell, who usually gets the family in for a big group hug, always one of his favourite shots.

"I guess I bring a warmth into the photography that I do."

ing photos... for weddings, bar mitzvahs and corporate events."

Himell loves getting to know the people and stories behind the pictures, too. "It's the relationships and interactions you get to have with so many of the clients... kind of a window [into] everyone's personal life," Himell said.

Marlowe features great food, beautiful décor

Restaurant 'is more than just a place to eat. It's a true destination.'

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

With an endless number of restaurants in the Toronto area, there is no shortage of places to choose from. Whether you're heading out on a date with your family or with a larger party, making the decision about where to go can be tough.

For something different, diners should check out Marlowe Restaurant and Wine Bar, 155 York Blvd., www.themarlowe.ca, 905-771-8645, one of the best fine dining restaurants in Richmond Hill.

Marlowe, which was opened seven years ago by owner Andrew Taranowski, operates as a restaurant for dinner seven nights a week and lunch from Monday to Friday.

"It's more than just a place to eat," said Heidi Rybak, an event co-ordinator at Marlowe. "It's a true destination stop with delicious food, amazing wine and beautiful décor."

Marlowe distinguishes itself from other restaurants by offering live entertainment several nights of the week, including jazz musicians, salsa dancers, DJs and percussionists.

On Friday and Saturday nights, the place is converted to a nightclub after 11 p.m. Marlowe's wine bar offers hundreds of choices, and you can purchase wine by the glass.

Marlowe is also a popular place for hosting private events, including weddings, bridal showers, birthday or anniversary parties as well as corporate events.

A private room can hold 50 to 100 guests, and on Sunday night, the entire restaurant can be booked and will hold up to 250 guests. Marlowe is wheelchair accessible.

When planning an event at Marlowe, Rybak or another event co-ordinator will walk you through every step.

"We'll discuss your vision of the event, and help customize it to your needs and budget," said Rybak. Marlowe has in-house linens and tableware, and can connect you with vendors for other aspects of the décor such as florists.

Rybak will also use her expertise to help plan a customized menu.

"Typically, for a large sit-down event, we would do a fixed menu. It would include three courses, and guests can choose from several options for each course," said Rybak.

Marlowe is happy to accommodate special diets such as vegetarian, vegan or gluten free.

"We offer set meals starting from $19.99 per person, so there is truly something for every budget."

For a less formal event, Rybak said cocktail parties are very popular.

"These are really fun for a holiday or engagement party because people can mingle while enjoying delicious snacks and drinks."

For an event like that, Rybak would suggest a variety of hors d'oeuvres, such as house smoked salmon pinwheels, szechwan dumplings with peanut sauce or spinach and feta spanakopita. Stations such as a pasta or Asian noodle bar and meat-carving stations can supplement hors d'oeuvres to make a complete meal.

"We get so much positive feedback from our guests, and I truly believe its because you can't find this kind of atmosphere anywhere else," said Rybak.

"We offer a trendy and hip venue, while still feeling classy and sophisticated. There's really nothing else like it."

Who pays for what?

Days of bride's parents footing the bill are long gone

Dear Ella,

I'm marrying the most wonderful man in the world. We're not getting married for another year, but we've already started to plan our wedding on paper. Both my family and his family are thrilled, and fortunately for us, they get along fabulously.

I'm a little worried about expenses, though. I come from a small family. My parents are older than Wayne's, and we don't have a lot of relatives. Wayne, however, has three brothers, two sets of grandparents and tons of aunts, uncles and cousins, and we both have lots of mutual friends as well. His dad is a builder, and they are very well off. My dad is retired and my parents are comfortable, but nothing like Wayne's parents.

Wayne and I are just getting started in our careers, so we have no money saved up to help with expenses. Is there any tactful way to bring this up and a fair way to split up who should pay for what?

Wedding Woes

Dear Wedding Woes,

With the cost of weddings being so high, the old-fashioned way of the bride's parents paying for most of the wedding is long gone. There are many ways wedding expenses can get split up these days.

The best way to start is with a meeting with Wayne and you and both sets of parents. There's no point in walking on eggshells in this meeting. Everyone needs to be honest with their expectations and limitations. Once you have an idea of where everyone's head is at, you can take it from there. From what you say, you're not expecting to have a small wedding. It sounds like Wayne's family will have more guests than yours. Also, you intimate that Wayne's family can afford more than yours. All these points must be taken into consideration when planning a wedding. It's important that you all work out a budget and stick to it as closely as possible.

Here are a couple of solutions that may work for your scenario. Your parents may have a certain figure in mind that they can afford for your wedding. Say that number is $20,000. They'll offer $20,000 to the pot, as that's all they can afford. Wayne's parents will take it from there. It can be their choice to keep their numbers small, or they can pay the balance of a larger wedding or to accommodate more guests.

The other way is for Wayne's parents to pay for their guests, and your parents will pay for yours. Your friends can be split by both families. For example, a wedding today might cost $250 a head, all in. That's venue, flowers, food, planner, etc. Say you have 75 guests and Wayne's family has 150 guests. That's 225 people at $250 a head, so you're looking at a budget of $56,250.

These are just two ways. There are others, but the most important thing is to make sure there's a meeting of the minds. Get the tough decisions out of the way, and have fun with the rest. This should be a wonderful time for the two of you and your families. Enjoy and mazal tov.

Caterer offers trendy and traditional menus

Encore mixes 30 years of experience with feel for today's foods

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Mixing the old and new is the secret behind Encore Catering's many years of success.

Cary Silber, owner of Encore Catering, has been in the business for more than 30 years, and he says he has catered more than 35,000 events. With so much experience, he's an expert at catering for any kind of event.

"When you have the experience that I have, and that the company has, we can pretty much do anything," he says. "There's nothing we haven't done yet."

Yet he keeps his business fresh and exciting through working with younger people. Both his son and his executive chef have worked for the business for a decade so, in addition to their experience, they bring a younger perspective to the company.

"They've got the young flair, the young feel for the foods of today," Silber says. "And I have the experience. We mix the old and new to keep moving forward. That's what keeps us young and in the know."

Throughout the company's history, Silber has watched new trends emerge in the food industry, and has worked hard to keep up with the times and the styles and foods of modern restaurants.

But these options are just suggestions. Menus are customized for each event based on a one-on-one consultation with the hosts to ensure each client gets exactly what they want. With experience as an off-premise caterer, the workers can adapt to any facility.

Clients can also work with Encore Catering to plan other aspects of their events, including invitations, valet parking and everything else. With his wealth of experience, Silber has made connections with other companies and can recommend the best businesses to his clients – so in a way, it's a full-service event business.

For all events, Encore Catering tries to be as environmentally friendly as possible, buying as many ingredients as they can from local sources, as well as aiming to use organic foods.

With so many food and service options, coupled with the many experts standing behind the company, it's no wonder they've been satisfying their clients for so many decades.

Contact Encore Catering by calling 416-661-4460 or visit their website at www.encorecatering.com.

"People are more sophisticated now, and people are world travellers so they see things all over the world, so we try to emulate those kinds of foods," he says. "It's really international-type cuisine, from Thai to Middle Eastern to European, everything really."

To keep the food tasting authentic, Silber employs people from all around the world. People who work in his kitchens hail from 10 different countries. "We have an international cooking brigade," he says. "It's really a multinational international kitchen."

Encore Catering doesn't do typical banquet meals. Instead, they aim to give the guests the experience of a restaurant.

"Each plate is made one at a time," he said, rather than cooking and heating all the plates at once.

The company's website shares sample menus to give clients just a taste of their wide-ranging options. One sample is a barbecue menu, featuring all-beef burgers and hot dogs, mixed spring greens with raspberry vinaigrette, freshly cut watermelon and chocolate-dipped biscotti, and much more.

Their Rosh Hashanah selection includes everything from chopped liver topped with frizzled onions to wild mushroom and porcini crepes, and cashew lakes. These are in addition to all the holiday usuals, such as chicken

Ehud Barak leaving politics

Joshua Davidovich and Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak announced on Monday that he would leave political life after the coming election, dropping a bombshell after a career that saw him rise from one of the country's most highly decorated soldiers to prime minister before falling out of favour and then making an improbable comeback.

His surprise announcement came less than a week after he oversaw Israel's Operation Pillar of Defence assault on Hamas and other rocket-firing terror groups in Gaza, and after almost four years in which he was Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's close security partner, working with him to formulate strategies aimed at thwarting Iran's drive to a nuclear weapons capability.

Barak, 70 and a nearly constant fixture at the top levels of the country's political leadership for the last two decades, said he would leave his post as defence minister when a new government is formed, likely in February.

He said he has deliberated for several weeks on the decision and is proud of his career, which included a stint as prime minister, but it's time to move on.

"I feel there is room now for other people to take up positions in Israel," he said. "There are many ways to contribute, but the state is not just politics."

Barak smiled throughout the press conference he called to make the announcement, and said he now wants to spend more time with his family. He noted that the surge in violence in the south and the start of Operation Pillar of Defence delayed his final decision until Monday morning.

"I am comfortable with my decision," he said. He noted that Netanyahu is aware of his decision, and said his much-reported episodes of friction with the prime minister have not influenced his course of action.

Netanyahu said he "respects" Barak's decision to retire from political life.

Vandalism Targets Pro-Israel UQAM Prof

MONTREAL — The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) condemned the "act of intimidation" against Université du Québec à Montréal (UQAM) professor Julien Bauer, a vocal Israel supporter.

A message, in black paint, beginning with "Heil Israel" and followed by an insulting reference to Bauer's intellect were found on his office door the morning of Nov. 21.

The head of Bauer's political science department, Julian Durazo-Herrmann, denounced the graffiti as "hateful and racist," adding, "attempts to intimidate and silence members of the university community... are unacceptable."

In a statement, CIJA applauded Herrmann's swift and firm response and said it hopes UQAM security will find the perpetrator.

Bauer, who has taught at UQAM for more than 30 years, told The C/JN that despite this attempt to intimidate him, he does not scare easily. "The idiot who can intimidate me has not been born yet," he said.

He said he has had many heated discussions with pro-Palestinian students and some faculty, and is always vocal in defending Israel. But he recalled only one similar incident around 30 years ago when Concordia dragged its feet in removing some graffiti, until he threatened to go to the TV networks. In this case, the removal began the day the graffiti was found.

Bauer said he has received many emails, from the crudely antisemitic to support from former students.

Hamas miscalculated on attacks, Ross says

Former envoy expects truce to erode in time

Dennis Ross

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Hamas committed a serious miscalculation by triggering the recent eight-day border war with Israel, says Dennis Ross, the former U.S. envoy to the Middle East.

In a speech in Toronto last week, he suggested that Hamas laboured under a grand illusion in thinking that Israel would not respond harshly to a significant upsurge in rocket attacks.

Hamas incorrectly assumed that Israel would bow to a "new normal" of increased rocket barrages, Ross said in delivering the Joseph and Gertie Schwartz Memorial Lecture at the University of Toronto's Centre for Jewish Studies.

In recent months, he explained, the lulls between rocket assaults were steadily decreasing. Hamas, too, was not only taking direct responsibility for these attacks, it was no longer even trying to stop more radical groups, such as Islamic Jihad, from attacking Israel, he said.

Hamas also miscalculated by assuming that Israel would exercise restraint due to three interlocking factors: the forthcoming Israeli election, Israel's preoccupation with Iran's nuclear program and Israel's desire not to offend the new Islamic government in Egypt.

Thanks to the U.S. and Egyptian-brokered ceasefire that ended the fighting, life for Israelis will improve in the next few months, Ross said. But over time, the truce will likely erode, just like previous ones, he warned.

Ross praised Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi for playing a key role in arranging last week's truce. By doing so, Morsi elevated Egypt's status as a regional power.

Although he threw his support behind Hamas and remains anti-Israel to the point of refusing to maintain direct contact with Israeli leaders, Morsi adopted a practical rather than an ideological approach to peacemaking at precisely the right moment, Ross said.

Morsi's decision to broker the ceasefire in conjunction with the United States stemmed primarily from a desire to get much-needed economic assistance from the United States and the International Monetary Fund.

Fresh from one disaster wrought upon them by their leaders in Gaza, the Palestinian people are about to suffer yet another disaster at the hands of their leaders in Ramallah.

Mahmoud Abbas, the head of the Palestinian Authority (PA), was scheduled today (Nov. 29) to ask the General Assembly of the United Nations (UNGA) to upgrade the status of Palestine at the United Nations to that of non-member status.

As a non-member state, the Palestinians would have access to the myriad forums, agencies and venues of the UN. The PA especially covets access to the International Criminal Court in The Hague, where they would likely bring all manner of charges against the Jewish state.

In addition, even as a non-member state, Palestine would still be in need of defined borders. The UNGA resolution granting non-member status would therefore likely also acknowledge at least theoretical borders of Palestine by referring to the pre-Six Day War borders of June 1967.

This in turn, would mean the "transfer" of east Jerusalem, including the Kotel, to the Palestinians. We do not write "transfer back" to the Palestinians since the Palestinians never ever had sovereign rule over east Jerusalem and the Western Wall.

That the request will receive the approval of the General Assembly is not in doubt. The necessary votes are guaranteed simply in the bloc votes of the Arab, Muslim and "non-aligned" worlds. But Abbas proceeded with the UN application over the unambiguous objections of the Canadian government, the Barack Obama administration and most European Union countries. Indeed, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton reportedly told Abbas during their meeting last week in Ramallah that the Palestinians

The date adds poignance

"would destroy themselves politically" if they press forward with their unilateral UN bid.

In the morally inverted, topsy-turvy world of Palestinian politics, Abbas has been described as "definitely more adamant to go to the United Nations" after the publicly self-aggrandizing claims by his rivals Hamas of victory in regard to the eight days that they took shelter under hospitals and near schoolchildren while the Israel air force systematically destroyed most of their long-range and other weapons capabilities.

In his consistently disingenuous manner, Abbas said last week that he was ready to return to the negotiating table immediately after his petition to the United Nations is granted.

How can he be believed?

Most commentators and observers have noted that Abbas' request to the General Assembly takes place on the very same day, 65 years ago, when the UN General Assembly voted to partition the already geographically truncated Palestine into a proposed Jewish state and an Arab state.

The Jewish leadership accepted the partition. The Arab leadership rejected it. The Arab leaders – of the Arab League and of the local Arab population then in Mandatory Palestine – launched what would eventually turn out to be Israel's War of Independence.

The Palestinian leaders intended resort to the General Assembly on Nov. 29 to be a sort of slap in the face of the Jews, reveling in irony of turning of history's dial away from the Jews' achievements 65 years ago.

But in this pathetically theatrical play they have also failed. For the timing of their latest UN play – by comparison – merely adds a profoundly biting poignancy to the utterly bereft and empty cupboard of Palestinian achievements since that same time, 65 years ago.

Had the Palestinian leaders, it must be pointed out again and again, agreed, as the Jewish leaders did, to accept less than their maximum demands, Palestine as a sovereign state would today be on the verge of commemorating its 65th year of independence and freedom.

But the Arab League and local Palestinian leaders scoffed at the notion of co-existence with a Jewish state in 1947, as they had in 1936 and then again in 1949. They have done so ever since: in 1967, 1977 and perhaps most egregiously when Yasser Arafat fraudulently signed the Oslo accords in 1993.

Canadians should know that the renowned diplomat Lester B. Pearson was instrumental in 1947 in getting the United Nations to establish a special committee on Palestine that travelled to the strife-laden Mideast region to investigate and report its findings about the future of Mandatory Palestine.

Canadians should know further that equally renowned Canadian Supreme Court judge and jurist Ivan Rand was appointed a member of that committee and was instrumental in persuading it to recommend partition.

Pearson and Rand, both men of integrity, were of the sincere belief that partition was the fairest, most humane and honourable solution, in the circumstances, to a very complicated, complex problem.

The rejection of partition by Arab leaders will stand throughout time as one of the cruelest acts of betrayal by so-called leaders against their own people. That betrayal continues to this day.

Robbins to close Beth Tikvah campus

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Robbins Hebrew Academy announced last Friday that it will close its Bayview campus, located at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, after the 2012-2013 school year.

Wayne Chertkow and Jay Feldman, co-chairs of the school's board of directors, announced in an e-mail to parents the "difficult but necessary" decision that it will not be possible to offer classes at Bayview after this year due to steadily declining enrolment.

As well, a news release from the school noted that the Bayview location has "for a number of years, been challenged by the demographics of a declining Jewish population in the Bayview/Sheppard and adjoining neighbourhoods."

Chertkow and Feldman said in their letter that the two campuses of the school – which both have classes from junior kindergarten to Grade 8 – would be consolidated on the Bathurst campus, located at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"For a number of years, there have been many discussions about the future about the Bayview campus, and RHA leadership and the board have taken extraordinary steps to find a solution to keep the campus viable," they wrote. "Unfortunately, despite our best efforts... the Bayview campus is no longer sustainable."

The news release said that RHA would work closely with Bayview families "to ascertain their needs and enable them to continue to educate their children at our Bathurst campus, or explore attendance at other Hebrew day schools."

The release also said that enrolment at the Bathurst campus is "strong, as is the campus' financial sustainability." The Bathurst campus has 350 students.

The Bayview campus can accommodate 500 students, but has 145 students enrolled this year. Since 2009, it has experienced a cumulative 65 per cent decline in enrolment, according to the release.

As recently as 2010, the school had a total of 800 students. It closed its Richmond Hill branch in 2006.

Claire Sumerlus, RHA's head of school, said in the release, "We are very sad to do this, but are committed to ensuring a great final school year for 2012-2013 and are planning a number of cross-campus initiatives. We are going to ensure this is the best year possible for our Bayview students."

Torontonians rallied for Israel as rockets fell

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

More than 2,000 people, many waving Canadian or Israeli flags, showed their support for Israel at a packed rally at Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue on Nov. 19. It was the first of at least eight such events Canada-wide.

Community officials said some 1,100 more watched the Toronto rally at three satellite locations.

James Moore
(Ben Katan Photography)

The event was organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, with help from the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). The federation has also set up an Israel Emergency Relief fund (ujadonations.com/ Israel).

As of last week, supporters had pledged approximately $1 million. Steven Shulman, campaign director and counsel, told The C/N.

DJ Schneeweis, consul general of Israel for Ontario and western Canada, said, "I'm here tonight to tell you Israel is strong." He also lauded Israel's Iron Dome missile defence system, but said Israel is "perhaps most strong" because of its moral compass. "We will not let our enemies change who we are," he said.

James Moore, minister of Canadian heritage and official languages, speaking on behalf of the government of Canada, described Prime Minister Stephen Harper as "a man whose support for Israel is unshakeable and unyielding. He sees what's right and what's wrong."

"Now is the time when free democratic nations of the world must unite and say clearly and firmly, 'We stand with Israel,'" Moore said, referring to the thousands of rockets that have been fired at Israel in the past decade, and "its right to defend its very existence."

"Make no mistake," Moore warned. "Those who pose a threat to the existence of Israel pose a threat to us all."

York University student Jessica Cherkasov said her heart is "truly broken" when she sees hatred of Israel "being disguised as freedom of speech" by groups on campus.

MC Morris Perlis, incoming senior vice-chair of the federation and vice co-chair of CIJA, expressed pride in Cherkasov and other students "who stand up to defend what is right."

Author, columnist and investment adviser Theo Caldwell said the response to hatred must be "patience, forbearance and the truth."

As well, Caldwell, who is Presbyterian, told the audience, "I would urge my Jewish friends to embrace the freely offered friendship of every denomination of the Christian faith."

Julia Koschitzky, speaking by Skype from Tel Aviv, said she doesn't think she's ever felt more proud to be Canadian.

An Israeli family of four living on a kibbutz less than two kilometres from Gaza were with her. The parents spoke of the difficulties of life under attack and thanked the audience for its support, including funding for mobile bomb shelters.

IDF spokesperson Lieut.-Col. Avital Leibovitch, who was also with Koschitzky, said, "Today was a relatively quiet day," explaining that there were only 116 rockets fired from Gaza.

The IDF has put "great efforts" into trying to minimize civilian casualties in Gaza when it targeted rocket launchers and other sites, Leibovitch said.

Perlis described the four IDF soldiers who were part of the Beth Emeth program as "our heroes."

Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Synagogue, had a message for the Palestinians of Gaza: "If you seek to live beside Israel in peace, you are not our enemy. Rather, your leaders are the enemy."

Journalist, author and political adviser David Frum, the rally's keynote speaker, expressed respect for those in the Islamic world who work for peace, as well as sympathy to Palestinians who've been used as "human shields" by their leaders, and pride in Canada and its government and in the State of Israel and its people.

He praised Israel for responding to "indiscriminate violence" with restraint, "while Israel's enemies respect no limits. They're as happy to kill children as adults. Israel has applied its advanced technology to target as precisely as possible."

"No country in the history of warfare has done more to protect the civilian population in a war those enemies started. Electrical [power] and drinking water continue to flow into Gaza," he noted.

Frum urged rally-goers to post pictures of the event online to send a message around the world that Israel is not alone.

Schneeweis told The C/N after the rally, "It was a wonderful and uplifting event. All credit to UJA Federation for organizing it in such a short space of time and to all the thousands who came out to express their support and love for Israel at this time."

Rally gave me plenty to think about

Taylor Isen

Co-op Student

There were many excellent speakers at the Nov. 19 "Rally for Israel" at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation. Each left me with a great deal to think about.

For example, author columnist/broadcaster Theo Caldwell suggested that we try to respond to difficult situations with "patience, forbearance and the truth."

Guest Voice

Speaking on behalf of the government of Canada, James Moore, the minister of Canadian heritage and languages, told the large gathering that "we gather here in solidarity... with one voice to let our friends in Israel know that without hesitation we do all stand for them."

Rabbi Howard Morrison, Beth Emeth's spiritual leader, used the story of Jacob and Esau to help us understand the need for the world to stand up against violence.

But it was my conversation with one of the women who attended the event that brought home the importance of our having been at the shul that night.

After the rally, I sat down with Dina Prager. Formerly of Israel, she still has family living there. She shared her thoughts and feelings with me.

"Israel has been dealing with this for years," Dina told me. The current fighting, she believed, is "once and for all" to end the conflict with terrorists and Hamas. She mentioned that she had recently spoken with her family in Israel and that, thankfully, they were fine, though some had to move from their kibbutz to safety.

Dina said she was "proud to live here" and that "Canada was really showing Israelis that they are not alone."

In fact, that was a message all the speakers made sure everyone at the rally heard, as well as the people connected to the event via satellite in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

For a very long time, Dina said, Israelis have felt that no one was on their side, that no country "has their back." But seeing the Canadian government stand strongly with Israel against Hamas was very empowering, she said.

"Being surrounded by people young and old, Israelis and non-Israelis, Jews and non-Jews, made me feel that Israel is really not alone," Dina said.

The most moving part of the evening for Dina was when she saw the video of IDF soldiers in Israel assuring us not to be worried, that they had everything under control.

She said it reminded her of the time her daughter had served in the IDF. The message brought tears to her eyes, she said.

When I asked her if she had anything she wanted to say to the IDF soldiers who flew in from Israel especially for the rally, Dina said "I wanted to give them a hug and a kiss."

We ended our conversation with Dina telling me that "it felt like we were were all one tonight."

I understood what she meant. It was a good feeling.

The zero sum of Hamas' broken parts

A clearer light could not shine. The contrasting manner by which most Gazans and most Israelis marked the ceasefire last week was a high-wattage incandescence sharply illuminating the core difference between the two societies.

Encouraged by their leaders, Gazan militia members danced in the streets shooting their automatic weapons into the air.

An observer could understand and even appreciate the celebrations if they had been an expression of relief that the incessant, razor-sharp bombing by the Israeli Air Force had finally come to an end. But the partying in the streets of Gaza was merely the latest manifestation of the self-delusion that passes for enlightenment in the political manifestos of the various Islamist factions there. The bombast of Gaza's leaders was as pathetically overwrought as it was patently false.

For example, according to the Times of Israel, one of Hamas' founders, Mahmoud al-Zahar "touted Hamas' combat success against Israel during the eight-day operation, claiming its fighters downed seven Israeli aircraft. The IDF has denied that any of its aircraft were shot down."

By contrast, there were no celebrations in Israel. Israeli leaders were quite subdued, even understated, in reporting the results of Operation Pillar of Defence to their people. Indeed they acknowledged with great frustration and disappointment the inevitability of a reprise of fighting with Hamas and their Islamist confederates in the future. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu did not embellish. "We took out thousands of rockets that were aimed at the south, and almost all of the rockets that were pointed at the centre of the country," He thus made plain that they did not destroy the entire cache of rockets in Gaza.

Israel's chief of staff, Benny Gantz, provided perhaps the truest perspective on the eight days of fighting.

"As the days pass and the dust settles, the other side will realize the price it paid for its actions. The results will speak for themselves... We have a strong military, excellent defence capabilities and a stalwart public. I am certain the future will prove this," he said.

And what might the future prove of the Palestinian public? Without a doubt it will show that seldom did history ever record a leadership that found constant celebration and festivity in the mountain of misery they themselves had brought down upon their own people.

The societal sum that Hamas has constructed for its people out of its many morally misshapen parts is a sad, disheartening zero.

25 years ago in The CJN

The Knesset interior committee decided that, like universities, all yeshivot in Israel that receive government funds would be required to fly the Israeli flag under the state's Symbols and Flag Law. MK Avraham Verdiger of the haredi Morasha Party said haredi yeshivot would ignore the law. He also called universities "dens of iniquity where drugs, lewdness and prostitution are rife."

Israel should help PA

Now that there is a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas, Israel needs to be tactically smart with Hamas. Israel ought to undercut Hamas by assisting the secular Palestinian Authority led by President Mahmoud Abbas. It's in Israel's best interest to show the world and Palestinians in Gaza that if you co-operate with Israel, you can have a much better life than if you provoke Israel into violent action to protect its citizens. It's a matter of appealing to the Palestinians' best interests. Unfortunately, this strategy has not been used by the current Israeli government, which is short-sighted. There is no military solution that can achieve a meaningful peace in the Middle East.

People tend to behave in their own best interests. In Gaza, the majority of the population is under the age of 20. As they grow older, they will not want to have bombs falling from the sky or see protests in the streets, especially if they see their brothers and sisters living peaceful middle-class lives in the West Bank.

Hopes peace will hold

Last Wednesday, I listened to a broadcast announcing a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas. It was a pleasure to listen to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. He spoke sincerely, diplomatically and firmly as he thanked all the parties involved. We in North America and the Israelis should very proud of Netanyahu as well as Israel Defence Forces' spokesperson Mark Reggev. Let's hope the peace will hold until they all come to the final peace agreement. However, Hamas and the rest of the Arab world must change their thinking. Israel will not disappear and must be recognized by the Palestinians eventually.

'Surgical strikes' a fantasy

Regarding the recent Hamas/Israel conflict, Syria and Iran were desperate to haul Israel into the centre of world opinion, if only to detract from their own dire problems. They knew that if they could pick, pick, pick away at Israel, then Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, with an election imminent, couldn't resist unleashing a massive response. The inconvenient truth about Gaza is that its extremely high population density makes "surgical strikes" a fantasy – it's hard to knock out a building or a car without unintentionally tearing through some innocent bystander's aorta. Everyone knew that when Hamas talked about "unleashing the hounds of hell," it was code for renewed attacks on Israel's public transit, most likely its favourite targets, the highly accessible buses.

Hamas fires missiles at Jerusalem

One part of the editorial "Israel must prevail" (Nov. 22) resonated deeply with me – that of Hamas firing missiles at Jerusalem. David Horowitz, editor of The Times of Israel, was quoted, in part: "In firing missiles toward Jerusalem... (Hamas leaders) showed utter indifference... Those rockets could have slammed into places holy to Jews, to Christians, and to Muslims."

That brought to mind the biblical story of King Solomon and the two women who both claimed to be the birth mother of the same infant. As Solomon raised his sword to sever the child in two, the true mother cried out to spare the child even as the false mother stood ready to see it destroyed.

So it is with the Arabs/Hamas who on the one hand declare their passionate "paternity" over Jerusalem, which they declare they will defend to the death, and on the other, they hurl deadly missiles at the defenceless ancient capital, echoing the biblical imposter: "Better no one possess her than the true owner!"

Goldi Steiner

Women and the Wall

In her column, "Let's make space at the Wall for everyone" (Nov. 15), Sara R. Horowitz erroneously states that the head of Women at the Wall was arrested for saying Shema at the Western Wall, when it was for wearing a tallit in the main Orthodox plaza rather than in the non-Orthodox section. The secular authorities designated these two areas as a compromise to avoid these embarrassing scenes of conflict, and it is a pity that while the Orthodox have always respected this agreement, the Women of the Wall have not.

'The time had not yet come to enter Gaza'

Yifa Yaakov

The Times of Israel.com

JERUSALEM — Operation Pillar of Defence achieved its objectives, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said Nov. 23 amid accusations that the costly operation had been cut short prematurely without subduing Hamas.

"I believe power lies not just in striking, but also in restraint," Lieberman told Channel 2 News, saying that the issue of Hamas rule in Gaza was far from resolved, but now was not the time to resolve it.

"Everyone in the State of Israel, every mother and father, should be aware that a [ground operation in Gaza] is a last resort for when there is no other option... I don't want to go into too much detail, but let everyone imagine our soldiers entering all the alleyways of the refugee camps, all the streets of Gaza, Rafah — it's not going to be easy," he stressed.

A senior diplomatic source told the channel that a full-fledged ground operation could have cost Israel some 200 lives, well above the death tolls for 2008's Operation Cast Lead, in which 13 soldiers were killed, and the 121 soldiers killed in 2006's war with Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Lieberman, together with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak, has been under heavy pressure from the Israeli public to defend the decision to end the operation Nov. 21.

Residents in the south held protests Nov. 21 and 22 against the government's decision, complaining that the country's leaders had accomplished nothing and the rocket fire would soon continue.

Barak and Lieberman told Channel 2 that they could not base decisions only on public opinion.

"There's no use in listening to the Israeli public where these matters are concerned — the leadership has to make decisions," Barak said, adding that the leadership had a wider field of vision on which to base its decisions.

"I remember situations in which the 80 per cent of the Israeli public supported something, and after 10 days it turned out that it was a huge failure. We decided the time hadn't come for a large-scale operation to enter Gaza and conquer it... we may get there in the future, but it's very important that we get there when the international community, and especially the United States, understands our position."

Lieberman, considered the most hawkish of the three men, said the government had done the best it could, given the situation it was in.

Avigdor Lieberman attends press conference announcing the ceasefire (Flash90)

"It's clear to me that in the circumstances we were in, we made the best possible decision. It's impossible to share all the considerations, all the data, all the deliberations — and there were many — with the public. But at the end of the day, we created a new reality: we defined the objectives of the operation in a precise and measured way," Lieberman said.

He said that Operation Pillar of Defence had three main objectives, all of which were fulfilled — "ending the rocket fire against Israeli civilians, rehabilitating our power of deterrence and destroying

Lieberman referred to former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, who, he noted, received a Nobel Peace Prize for his role in the creation of the Oslo accords. "When they asked him, 'What will we do if there is shooting from Gaza?' he said, 'What's the problem? We'll reconquer Gaza.' Apparently, it's not so easy to conquer Gaza."

The foreign minister stressed that a partial ground operation would not suffice to fulfil Israel's long-term strategic goals. "If you go for a ground operation, front as well... and sometimes it's no less important," he said. "I say that in this case — and it isn't possible to share all the considerations with everyone — it was the right decision, it's the right decision even if it's unpopular at times, and I can understand the public sentiment that an opportunity was missed."

When asked whether the Israeli government had deliberately decided to negotiate with Hamas after pushing West Bank-based Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to the sidelines, Lieberman responded that Abbas was simply implementing a "division of labour" by engaging in "political terrorism," leaving the "terrorism on the ground" to Hamas.

"We aren't talking to Hamas. We're talking to Egypt," Lieberman said.

Hamas emerged from the conflict with a significant gain in international credibility, with Arab and Turkish diplomats pouring into Gaza to show support. Although it's defined as a terror group by Israel, the United States and others, Hamas was treated as an equal partner with Israel during indirect cease-fire talks in Egypt. As the Arab Spring brings Islamists to power across the region, Hamas' influence appears to be on the rise.

Barak told Channel 2, however, that while the group was celebrating its "victory," it had not won anything at all.

"In Gaza, they are deceiving their people," he said. "They are celebrating the shooting down of an F-16, as well as the rockets that allegedly landed in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. We know the truth," said Barak, referring to false Hamas claims.

He added that the mere memory of Operation Pillar of Defence would prevent Hamas from breaking the ceasefire.

"In my estimation, today we will obtain a relatively long hiatus," Barak said. "A long line of commanders was targeted, and their military chief is dead and buried... they don't really have achievements."

Hamas paid a price, IDF's Gantz says

Ron Friedman

The Times of Israel

IDF chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz said that all the objectives laid out ahead of Operation Pillar of Defence were met during the eight days of fighting.

"In its entirety, the operation was coordinated with the upper echelon. We knew what we wanted to achieve and how we wanted to act," Gantz said while visiting wounded soldiers at the Soroka Medical Center in Be'er Sheva Nov. 23. "All the operation's objectives were successfully met."

He added that as "days pass and the dust settles, the other side will realize the price it paid for its actions," and people should not get worked up over "the various demonstrations" being held by Hamas and its supporters hailing victory.

"The results will speak for themselves," he said.

Gantz thanked all those who took part in the operation. "We have a strong military, excellent defence capabilities and a stalwart public. I am certain the future will prove this," he said.

Earlier on Nov. 23, friends and family members attended the funeral of reserve officer Boris Yarmolnik, 28, who died from wounds suffered from an explosion caused by a rocket fired from Gaza.

Reserve soldiers who were called up last week to take part in the Gaza operation were released to go home on Nov. 22 and 23.

The cabinet unanimously voted Nov. 23 to rescind the home front's emergency status condition. The ministers reportedly voted on the measure by phone.

There is another way

The Times of Israel

It was very difficult for me to write during the first days of Operation Pillar of Defence, because three of my sons are in the army, many of my family and friends were called up to reserve duty, (many of whom I said goodbye to with a prayer that they return speedily and safely), and because so many of our citizens are living under constant and unbearable fire.

I completely identify with the IDF operation to undermine the terrorist infrastructure of rockets that for close to 13 years has embittered the lives of hundreds of thousands of people in the south of Israel, especially because the operation was carried out under the strictest rules of engagement in an attempt to minimize civilian casualties.

At the same time, however, I have a deep and painful feeling that despite the fact that our actions are justified, they are being carried out with no long-term strategy and no chance of solving the problem – not for those living in the south, nor for the State of Israel.

Perhaps to the contrary.

While the operation may provide the sense of accomplishing something or give us instant gratification, in reality it only serves to deepen the problem. And it makes it more difficult to achieve a real solution to the difficult and complex situation in which we find ourselves.

If our basic assumption is that there is no alternative, and we accept the curse of Esau, to forever

Rabbi Michael Melchior

live by the sword, then we are certainly on the right path.

But then we must also realize and accept that there will never be any alternative or hope for a different and better future.

I truly believe that there is another way.

For how many years did every expert tell us that peace with the Arabs could never be achieved? Yet, today we mark the anniversary of the late Egyptian president Anwar Sadat's historic visit to Jerusalem, that unforgettable and moving motza'ei Shabbat when he declared, "No more war." Even through all the ups and downs and all the changes that we have experienced since then, his declaration lives on and has stood strong for the last 35 years.

For how many years did every expert tell us that if the Muslim Brotherhood, (the murderers of Sadat), were to assume power in Egypt, their religion would never permit them to come to terms with any kind of Jewish entity in this part of the world, which is considered holy Islamic territory. Yet, we were witness to the elected Egyptian president, representing the Muslim Brotherhood of Egypt, leading negotiations between the State of the Jewish People and the Gaza branch of the Islamic Brotherhood (Hamas).

I believe that what we need to do now is to reach a hudnah (truce) with Hamas for several years and during this time, enter into an intensive negotiation with the elected Palestinian leadership for a comprehensive and just solution based on two states for the two peoples. But, this time around, we need the active and full involvement and support of the Islamic world.

As opposed to past negotiation attempts, there must be full inclusion of Muslim leadership from throughout the Middle East in general, and from the Holy Land in particular, who are prepared to reach a just solution for the two peoples based on dialectic religious thinking. Leaders who believe in the necessity to respect the will of God, in whose image we are all created and who understand that crushing His image by spilling the blood of the "other" ultimately desecrates His Holy Name in the world.

So, for a moment, close your eyes and imagine how such a world could look. Now open them. The truth is that 80 per cent of both Israelis and Palestinians support this kind of peace and long for it to happen. Both peoples lack the faith that the other side has the same dream. We need to foster this faith.

"The Lord gives strength to His people; The Lord blesses His people with peace." (Psalms 29:10)

Yair Lootsteen will return.

By all means, free Gaza – from Hamas

For years, faux human rights activists have run campaigns based on the theme of "Free Gaza" – marketing the slogan that Israel's blockade is responsible for the suffering of millions of Palestinians. They have organized highly publicized "humanitarian aid" flotillas (carrying almost no aid); held violent protests at universities (York University is on the hit list again), and justified boycotts, divestment and sanctions around the false images of "collective punishment" and Palestinian victimization.

In the latest "Free Gaza" violence, these individuals and groups share major responsibility in producing and marketing this tragedy. With this political backing, the Hamas leadership was confident (overly confident, it turned out) that it could escalate attacks on Israelis and count on international campaigns to quickly stop the counterattack. This strategy worked for them in the previous round (December 2008 to January 2009), as it did for Hezbollah in 2006. With a stream of "flotillas" and accompanying publicity, including fringe Canadian groups, Hamas thought it was safe.

One of the most active groups involved in the "Free Gaza" industry is an Israel-based NGO known as Gisha, which substitutes itself the "Legal Center for Freedom of Movement." Gisha has waged a media campaign to promote what it portrays as Israel's policy of starving the population of Gaza and preventing Gazans from traveling and importing goods unencumbered. Gisha and its many allies have erased all traces of Hamas, including its brutality against its own people and its acquisition of thousands of rockets, which Hamas has hidden in schools, mosques and homes.

Anyone who is actually concerned about the welfare of the people of Gaza and does not belong to the church of "it's all Israel's fault" would have focused the generous resources provided by foreign donors (including the New Israel Fund and anonymous European government officials) on liberating Gaza's citizens and Israelis from Hamas.

But instead, they've constructed a fictitious Gaza based on the total disconnect (overlooked by journalists committed to the Palestinian victimization promoted by NGOs) between the image of deprivation and the huge sums spent on rockets and missiles to attack Israel. According to the IDF, in the past decade, more than 13,000 rockets and mortars – an average of three per day – have been launched against Israel. Some 800 were fired in just five days beginning Nov. 14.

The missile industry – the biggest in Gaza – consumes huge resources and tens of millions of dollars, pounds, euros and dinars. How many school lunches, prenatal and infant care medical checks and other social welfare measures could this money have been used to buy, if only the Hamas overlords of Gaza were so inclined?

Similarly, according to media reports, Gaza has "15,000 Qassam fighters who are responsible for most of the rocket blitzes." While some societies encourage their best and brightest to go to universities, become scientists, build businesses and create jobs, in Gaza, the best jobs are making and shooting rockets to kill Israeli civilians.

Gerald Steinberg

All of this is erased in the distorted universe of the NGO human rights network and their funder-enablers, such as the New Israeli Fund (NIF) and hidden European government officials. In their absurd, patronizing and morally inverted version of reality, all responsibility and blame lies with Israel.

Another radical fringe group with a major bank account is "Breaking the Silence" (BTS), which has received $523,342 from the NIF from 2006 through 2011, with additional funds from Europe. BTS plays a central role in the dissemination of false "war crimes" accusations against Israel, including in the notorious Goldstone report of 2009.

Now, BTS is seeking to repeat this process by drawing comparisons between the fictitious "crimes" of four years ago, and the current Israeli operation in Gaza. As in the case of Gisha and many others, there is no mention of Palestinian war crimes (such as every rocket attack) and the intimidation through which Hamas controls Gaza. On these issues, the silence is deafening.

There are many more examples selling more or less the same defective product. In contrast, a real and moral "Free Gaza" movement would close the missile industry and help Israelis and Palestinians in liberating themselves from the tyranny of Hamas.

Israel's never-ending struggle with Hamas

For the past three years, the question was not if but when the shaky truce between Israel and its arch enemies in the Gaza Strip, notably Hamas and Islamic Jihad, would finally break down in a welter of violence.

The ceasefire collapsed on Nov. 14 when Israel unleashed Operation Pillar of Defence in reaction to a barrage of rocket and mortar launches, border attacks and attempted infiltrations by Palestinian groups backed by Iran and Syria.

Nearly four years after Israel invaded Gaza in Operation Cast Lead – its biggest air, land and sea assault on Gaza since its unilateral withdrawal in 2005 – Israel was again embroiled in a military struggle with its perennial nemesis, Hamas, which openly and unambiguously calls for its destruction and wallows in a perverse culture of martyrdom.

Cast Lead, which lasted three weeks, ended when Israel unilaterally declared a ceasefire, and Hamas followed suit a week later. But even as Israeli troops streamed out of Gaza – a congested slum of 1.7 million inhabitants and a thorn in Israel's side, particularly since Hamas' violent takeover in 2007 – Israeli pundits wondered when Round 2 would erupt.

By invading Gaza in 2009, Israel managed to some extent to restore its deterrent power. The conventional wisdom in Israel was that Hamas, having touched off a war that resulted in the deaths of 1,400 Palestinians, including some 700 Palestinian combatants, and having caused such devastating property damage in Gaza, might not undertake reckless new adventures. Hezbollah, after all, had been deterred by the Second Lebanon War in 2006. So why not Hamas?

By all accounts, Hamas, known as the Islamic Resistance Movement, was apparently prepared to observe the truce. But Hamas was unable or unwilling to rein in more radical factions, namely Islamic Jihad, the Popular Resistance Committees and Jaish al-Ummah, a jihadist group affiliated with Al Qaeda.

In 2009 and 2010, Palestinians fired 400 rockets and mortars into Israel in an attempt to inflame border tensions, prompting Israel to hit back in measured reprisals. The number of rocket and mortar firings jumped to 600 in 2011 and to 700 by mid-November of this year.

The Palestinian missile threat has posed a formidable challenge to Israel since October 2001, when Hamas fired the first of what would be 13,000 projectiles at Israel. Hamas, inspired by Iraq's bombardment of Israel during the 1991 Gulf War, turned to rocketry after Israel sealed off Gaza with a security fence, making it virtually impossible for terrorists to cross into Israeli territory.

At first, the rocket threat affected roughly 50,000 Israelis living in close proximity to Gaza. But as the Palestinians improved their technology, thanks to Iran's and Syria's assistance, they succeeded in extending the range and firepower of their rockets.

Palestinian rockets, having become an intolerable threat to Israel, affect the lives of more than two million civilians and can paralyze Israel's economy and wreak considerable psychological havoc and distress on many Israelis. In short, rockets fired in anger may be as effective as suicide bombings, which have fallen away since Israel began building the security barrier along and through the West Bank.

The deterrence Israel established in Cast Lead gradually crumbled as Palestinian rocket and mortar attacks originating in Gaza rose to alarming levels, especially in March, June and August.

The Palestinians initiated the latest round of fighting in the hope of enlisting international pressure to force the lifting of Israel's naval blockade of Gaza, which has not really worked, and the permanent opening of all border crossings.

Beyond any doubt, the Palestinians were emboldened by recent developments in the Middle East. Since the Arab Spring, the popular rebellions that have topped one secular Arab regime after another, Hamas has grown stronger. The emergence of an Islamic government in Egypt, led by President Mohammed Morsi, has surely bolstered Hamas' stock. Much to Hamas' glee, Egypt blamed Israel for starting the war and recalled its newly arrived ambassador in Tel Aviv. And in a pointed show of solidarity with the Palestinians, Morsi dispatched Egyptian Prime Minister Hisham Kandil to Gaza City.

Hamas, too, has drawn strength from vigorous verbal support from Turkey, which has had frosty relations with Israel since Cast Lead, and from Qatar, whose emir recently visited Gaza and announced a $400-million gift for public works projects there.

Buoyed by the new realities in the region, and driven by its rivalry with Fatah, the mainstream Palestinian faction, Hamas threw caution to the wind and abandoned its creaky ceasefire with Israel. Hamas' decision to reignite a war with Israel was evident on the ground. Terrorist attacks rose from 91 in September to 166 in October, prompting a senior Israeli officer to warn that Israel might launch an incursion into Gaza.

Benjamin Netanyahu, at the helm of his first war as Israel's prime minister, activated Pillar of Defence after more than 160 rockets and mortar shells slammed into Israel in early November and after a series of increasingly serious border incidents that injured several Israeli soldiers.

Four days before Israel struck Gaza, Netanyahu invited 50 foreign ambassadors to Ashkelon – a persistent target of Palestinian rockets – to warn them that Israel's patience was wearing thin and that no nation on earth could tolerate such brazen violations of its sovereignty.

Israel's objectives in Pillar of Defence were clear: to suppress rocket fire, destroy Hamas' arsenal of long-range rockets (especially Iranian Fajr-5 missiles) and regain its deterrence. Israel bombed rocket launching sites, military storage facilities, arms smuggling tunnels and the homes of senior Hamas commanders, killing, among others, Ahmed Jabari, the supreme commander of Hamas forces. The Israeli Air Force pounded Hamas relentlessly, but Hamas responded in kind with ferocious rocket volleys aimed at Israeli towns ranging from Ashkelon and Ashdod to Be'er Sheva and Rishon LeZion.

Rockets penetrated the outskirts of Jerusalem and reached Tel Aviv, crashing harmlessly into the Mediterranean Sea and exploding in mid-air after being intercepted by the Iron Dome missile shield. The Iron Dome system, as well as the program of fortifying homes and public buildings within a seven-kilometre distance of Gaza, saved countless Israeli lives. Nevertheless, Israeli nerves were rattled by Hamas' success in sending rockets into Israel's heartland.

Israel destroyed much of Hamas' rockets during its offensive. But Hamas remains standing.

Since Israel's withdrawal from Gaza seven years ago, Israel has launched a series of bruising raids into Gaza, from Operation First Rain to Operation Warm Winter. But none has seriously dented Hamas' spirit or degraded its rocket arsenal, as Uzi Rubin points out in a monograph published by the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University.

Israel, one day, may sign a long-term truce with Hamas. In the meantime, despite a ceasefire that went into effect on Nov. 21, Israel faces an ideologically recalcitrant entity in Gaza that refuses to accept its very existence and is ready to fight to the last man.

Black joins panel on Iranian threat

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Three political pundits, including Conrad Black, recently spoke about what Israel and the United States should do to fight the Iranian nuclear threat.

Black, a former Canadian newspaper publisher, Mark Dubowitz, the executive director of a U.S. foundation, and Bret Stephens, an American newspaper columnist, shared their views to a full house at Beth Tzedec Congregation. The Nov. 19 event was sponsored by Torah in Motion.

Stephens, a columnist for the Wall Street Journal, said stopping Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons is effectively an attempt to stop World War III.

Dubowitz, executive director of the U.S.-based Foundation for Defense of Democracies, said that he and the other speakers had similar views about the situation – that there was no debate on whether something needed to be done about the Iranian nuclear threat.

Where the panellists differed, however, was in determining how it should be done, and, in particular, the efficacy of sanctions.

Black said he's not convinced sanctions work very well. "[Sanctions are] more than likely to produce an appetite for compromise and even concession," he said, explaining that he shares former British prime minister Margaret Thatcher's view on sanctions. They "punish all of the people, and not all of the people are responsible."

Dubowitz agreed that implementing sanctions isn't a "silver bullet." They're not going to stop Iran from building nuclear weapons, he said, but they have worked in placing the Iranian regime into the "penalty box."

"Sanctions have had a profound moral impact on the Iranian regime," he said, adding sanctions may accomplish the necessary preconditions for a military strike against Iran.

Stephens said it's not only important to get rid of Iran's nuclear facilities, but also to implement a long-term plan to rid the country of the current regime.

"It is hard to imagine unintended consequences that could possibly be worse than the foreseeable consequences of Iran being equipped with nuclear weapons," he said, adding that the possibility that Iran could actually use the weapons once they have them should not be discounted.

Black said countries such as the United States should be doing more to prevent a nuclear Iran, which includes the use of a military strike if the country does not yield to ultimatums.

While Dubowitz agreed that there are already enough justifications to take a military strike, he said the United States has an obligation to exhaust every peaceful method first, since a strike would put the lives of too many Americans and Israelis on the line.

"Even if we do resort to military strikes, it doesn't hurt to try to weaken them first with sanctions," he said, adding that sanctions are surely collapsing Iran's economy, but it isn't doing so fast enough.

Black contested that he wasn't suggesting a full-blown war with Iran. "We're just talking about blowing up a laboratory or a group of laboratories," he said. "If they don't stop it, then we are going to incite steadily more irresponsible and dangerous behaviour."

Dubowitz, despite his positive view of sanctions, doesn't believe diplomacy or sanctions will counter the Iranian threat. We know where these facilities are, and if we don't stop them by summer 2013, it will be too late, he said.

He said he's worried that U.S. President Barack Obama's administration will try to negotiate with Iran, and the United States will make a "stupid agreement" that might give Iran the right to enrichment.

All three speakers expressed worry that the Obama administration will not take strong enough action.

The sooner a military action is taken against Iran, the better, said Stephens. Maybe targeted bombing doesn't always work, and maybe some civilians will be killed, he said. But the governments cannot tremble in fear at the idea of some kind of military action against Iran.

"We are not, or ought not to be in the business of making sure that all of our actions can be justified in light of history or current circumstances," he said. "We are in the business of making sure that we, as Jews, and the State of the Israel, will survive for generations."

Pakistani media largely 'neutral' on Gaza conflict

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Here's a headline that might surprise Canadian readers with an interest in the conflict in the Middle East: "Gaza attack, not a priority for Pakistan's press."

Hasn't Pakistan been among Israel's harshest critics? Well yes, the article goes on to say, but, it adds: "For a country that has historically been extremely pro-Palestine and refused to recognize the state of Israel, the coverage of the recent Gaza attack by its media, especially local newspapers, has been slow in recognizing the issue."

So, what gives?

Tariq Khan, editor and founder of Weekly Press Pakistan-Canada (WPP), the Web service where the story appeared, said the attitude of Pakistan's media is "totally different" than during the 2008-09 Israel-Hamas war. "The Pakistan media is completely docile in this matter. They are not at all interested," he said.

Part of the reason is their intense focus on internal issues, which are numerous and significant. Another part is due to the influence WPP has had among the 15,000 Pakistani journalists who receive the news service. "I am very glad to say that whatever we're doing in Urdu and English has gone deeply to influence the Pakistani media: the Pakistani media is largely neutral," Khan said.

Since the 2009 conflict, WPP has run numerous stories on the region, presenting the Israeli perspective on developments to Pakistani readers in their own language, Urdu, and in English, Khan said.

"They have come to know for the first time a positive image of Israel."

The WPP carries news stories and features provided by the Israeli media service, Tazpit, which Khan often translates into Urdu.

As the conflict has unfolded, "my coverage is as usual," he continued. "We have been reporting all the facts, that Israel has total authority to protect themselves from the uncalled-for rocket attacks from Hamas."

Speaking as Israel massed thousands of troops for a possible ground war, Khan said, "Israel is restraining themselves from a full-fledged attack. I think this is a wise step. What they have done is a kind of defence of their own people and that is very much appreciated."

"I believe the Israel Defence Forces wisely hit the right kinds of targets to destroy the attackers. No doubt there are civilian casualties, which are regrettable by everybody, including Israel."

But, he continued, "Hamas places these rocket positions within the civilian population, which is very wrong."

Khan sees the escalation of rocket attacks on Israel by Hamas as "a total diversion of attention by the Iranian government, to shift attention to the area of Gaza."

Hamas, he noted, is supplied by Iran and Iran is facing international pressure related to its nuclear arms program.

Other stories carried on WPP's front page include those headed, "Israeli Schoolchildren Continue to be Rocket Targets for Hamas," "Life in Southern Israel – A Student's Blog," and "Canada condemns Hamas. Stands with Israel."

Khan has argued that most non-Arab Muslims hold no animus to Israel or Jews, and that good relations between the two groups could be the norm. He has joined with members of the Toronto Jewish community to sponsor events that bring members of both communities together in a casual, informal setting. The next event – the sixth in a series – will be held on Dec. 15 and will bring together 60 Jewish and Pakistani adults along with 30 youths from both groups, to sit together in small groups and discuss any issues they wish to raise.

Friends, family essential in dealing with grief: panel

Life can still be beautiful and meaningful, says rabbi

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

When you're dealing with death and grief, it's important to find comfort in friends and family since they can pull you out of isolation and help you through the grieving process.

Olivia Chow

That was one of the points made by the four speakers at a Nov. 15 panel at Beth Shalom Synagogue dealing with loss and personal tragedy.

Each panelist approached the topic, "The Many Facets of Personal Tragedy and Grief," from different angles.

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, from the hosting synagogue, opened the evening with a speech in which he described the feeling that comes with loss — a sense of believing that nothing will ever be the same.

"If we can step back and rearrange the words that frame this evening, I would say to you first, there is tragedy, then there is grief," he said. "Everyone's grief is different."

Paul Goldstein of Bereaved Jewish Families of Ontario (BJFO), which is run under the auspices of Jewish Family & Child, said attending grief sessions helped him face the death of his 20-year-old daughter, Shelley, who died in a car crash on her way to visit her sister at Camp Biluim in Mont-Tremblant, Que.

"In our grief, we cannot ever forget those around us who mean so much to us," he said. "Let friends know you value and need them. You never know who or what will comfort you."

Although she died almost 27 years ago, Goldstein said that, at times, the pain is still indescribable.

When he was first dealing with the death, he said he wanted to hide from the world and be alone with his emptiness and sadness. However, he learned he could run away from people, but not from his feelings.

Panelist MP Olivia Chow said although being with family and friends was immensely important when she was facing the death of her husband, former New Democratic Party leader Jack Layton, being in the public eye meant she also valued time alone.

"We had the state funeral, beautiful ceremonies, tributes," she said. "There are different forms of commemoration, and that part, it's comforting but it's also really difficult."

She tried to spend time alone, sometimes exercising, and often swimming. You can cry in the water and no one can tell, she said.

In addition to turning to friends and families, the speakers all agreed there were times when remembering their loved one was difficult, but helpful.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, of Beth Tzedec Congregation, said it can be difficult to get back to routine when you know the person isn't there anymore. Even sitting around a table can be a challenge, he said, since you notice the person's absence in an empty chair.

"Each of us can remember a particular place where we can see our father, mother, our child," he said. "And sometimes we don't want to touch it. But other times we want to sit in that chair. We want to lie down in that bed. We want to feel that person's presence."

The pews at Beth Shalom were mostly filled with seniors, many of whom were grieving. Throughout the speeches, some of them cried quietly, nodding as the speakers discussed their own experiences with death.

People nodded in agreement when Chow said she discovered that her grief comes and goes. "It could be an ordinary time and then boom, it comes, just like big waves."

Goldstein shared a similar experience. He said although the pain, at times, is still indescribable, he realized that death is not the end of a relationship.

"[My family] allows ourselves to remember and think of ten of Shelley. It brings sadness, but also the warmth of remembrance," he said. "Now when I think of my daughter, a smile comes to my face, and maybe tears."

Chow said she's not convinced that time will heal her sadness, although she added that she doesn't cry as often these days. The key, however, is to celebrate the deceased person to show that love conquers death, she said.

"How do we do that? By connecting with other people. By celebrating that person's legacy," she said.

She thought about Layton as she sculpted a bust of him as a memorial. She said while he was alive, he had asked her to make one, but she joked she didn't feel it was right to inflate his ego.

However, she found that sculpting it helped her connect with him in a private way, outside of her public life.

"Oh my God, was that ever hard," she said. "Was it therapeutic? Maybe. I don't know. It was very hard."

Rabbi Flanzraich stressed that everyone's grief is different, and unless you've faced such profound loss, you cannot understand the feeling, he said. For many, death can make it seem like nothing will ever be the same again, he added.

But "even though [life] might not be the same again," he said, "it doesn't mean life can't be both beautiful and meaningful."

Gaza II: The winners and losers

No sooner had the Nov. 21 Israel-Hamas ceasefire been agreed upon than the instant analysis of who "won" and who "lost" began in the media.

It was generally agreed that Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi was the big winner, with PA President Mahmoud Abbas more marginalized than ever (even as he insists on going to the UN General Assembly to have the PA's status upgraded in defiance of Israel and the United States). Also on the losing end was Turkey's President Recep Erdogan. Even though Turkey and Qatar supported Egypt and the United States to fashion the ceasefire, the obstinately anti-Israel Erdogan took a back seat to Morsi.

During an interview on CNN on the evening of Nov. 21, Israeli President Shimon Peres summed up the Egyptian president's position: "Morsi's heart is somewhere else [with the Brotherhood], but his behaviour is responsible."

Indeed, Morsi was widely commended for choosing political pragmatism over ideological fervour in trying to broker a deal, with strong American backing, that both Hamas and Israel could accept.

Then again, Morsi didn't have all that much choice in the matter, not if he plans to lead his country through a period of extreme economic turmoil, which means turning to the West for approximately $10 billion in assistance.

Still, Morsi has put himself on the line, and his prestige depends to a considerable degree on ensuring that Hamas abide by the ceasefire agreement. However, as Barak Ravid of Ha'aretz reported, while "Hamas and the other Palestinian organizations have promised to stop all attacks on Israel from the Gaza Strip, including rocket fire and attacks along the border... [an] accomplishment for Hamas is that the understandings do not force upon it the responsibility for enforcing the cease-fire on the other organizations in the Gaza Strip."

No wonder just a tiny fraction of Israelis (seven per cent according to a snap survey by Israel's Channel 2 on the night of Nov. 21) believe that the ceasefire will have a long-term effect. It's assumed that a scientific survey would show approximately the same lack of confidence: that, before long, Israelis will have to contend once again with missiles from Gaza. Veteran Yediot Achronot reporter Shimon Shiffer reflected this pessimism when he wrote about Israel's need to be allowed to live in peace and security: "It's a shame that it's not going to happen. The truth must be told... Hamas will determine how long the lull will last."

There is a feeling that, no matter how much damage the IDF's 1,500 sorties caused to Hamas' infrastructure, Israel failed to re-establish sufficient deterrence. This means that the troika of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Defence Minister Ehud Barak and Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman is credited with only a modest military gain in the latest round with Hamas. Yet, especially in international circles, they have been commended for political pragmatism in avoiding a costly ground war.

Ravid noted that the current memorandum of understanding resembles the ceasefire agreed to after Operation Cast Lead in 2009. "The only practical clause in the agreements is the cessation of fighting, according to the principle of 'quiet will be answered by quiet.'" Nonetheless, as with Cast Lead, "Israel has received guarantees from the United States that it will deal with weapons-smuggling into the strip, but estimates are that the practical meaning of this clause will be extremely limited."

In short, this is another way of saying that little will be effectively achieved in terms of stopping the lucrative smuggling of heavy arms, including Iranian missiles, into Gaza, as Hamas and other groups will almost surely seek to rebuild their stocks and military infrastructure.

One important but generally neglected area for journalists to venture into is the still largely lawless Sinai and the Egypt-Gaza border in order to examine how Bedouin, Hamas and jihadi groups have profited from the smuggling against paltry Egyptian efforts to stop it, as is required under the 1979 Egypt-Israel peace treaty – something that is rarely, if ever, mentioned.

Islamic group questions text used in Jewish school

JTA

A Canadian Islamic organization is accusing a Toronto-area Jewish day school of using a textbook that vilifies Muslims.

In a Nov. 19 letter to Jewish groups, the Canadian Council on American-Islamic Relations, or CAIR-CAN, charges that a textbook used at the Joe Dwek Ohr HaEmet Sephardic School in Thornhill employs "inflammatory and hateful terms in describing Muslims."

CAIR-CAN alleges that the book, 2000 Years of Jewish History, published by Feldheim Publishers, describes Muslims as "rabid fanatics" with "savage beginnings."

"The entire chapter devoted to Islam presents a pernicious and extreme portrayal of Muslims and the Islamic faith. The material further denigrates the Prophet Muhammad as a 'rabid Jew-hater,' and falsely portrays Islam as inherently antisemitic and devoted to hating Jews," the group said in its letter to the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center For Holocaust Studies (FSWC) and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

A perusal of the section cited by CAIR-CAN, shows a more nuanced and balanced reading of history than indicated in the letter. It reads, "The Sunnites were generally tolerant of the Jews; when Mawiyah I, founder of the Omayyad dynasty, was selected Caliph, the Shi'ites, who were rabid fanatics, rebelled and formed their own sect. Those Jews living under their rule in Iran and Yemen were called 'unclean' to the point where Jews were forbidden to venture outdoors in the rain, lest a drop of water that touched a Jew would also touch a Muslim and render him unclean as well. The Jews of Yemen, under the rule of the Imamins, were subjected to constant persecutions, including forced conversion and threats of death. Nevertheless, Mohammed's basic rules did serve to alleviate some of the harsher decrees that threatened Jewish lives."

"While the savage beginnings of Mohammed's sweeping massacres were often reflected in anti-Jewish legislation and vicious attacks against Jewish life and property, there were also long periods in which the Arabs accepted the Jewish in their communities and valued them for their cultural and commercial abilities. Indeed it was largely under the rule of the Mohammedan Caliphs that the entire Jewish nation enjoyed the 'Golden Age of the Geonim [leaders of Talmudic academies].'"

CAIR-CAN states in its letter, however, that the text, used in grade 7 and 8 girls' classes at the Orthodox Jewish day school, "leaves impressionable young Jewish readers with a sense of suspicion and even intolerance towards their fellow Canadians."

The group wants the Centre for Jewish Education of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to investigate.

In a press release, Rabbi Zvi Kamenetzky, the principal of the school, stated: "The administration of the Joe Dwek Ohr HaEmet Sephardic School has been advised of a concern regarding a book in our syllabus. We are currently investigating the merit of that concern."

"The book was never used for classroom teaching purposes and has been removed as a reference resource."

In its own statement, CIJA, which is affiliated with UJA Federation, said that it had "been advised by the school that it was not aware of the sensitive language included in parts of the textbook. We have been further advised that the school immediately removed the textbook from its classrooms and website... We are also assured that the teachers in this school are specifically instructed never to teach any material that can be considered derogatory to other faiths."

No one from the FSWC responded to JTA's or The CJA's requests for comment.

CAIR-CAN's salvo comes on the heels of a police investigation of a local Islamic school. Earlier this month, police cleared the school of hate crimes allegations following a complaint by Jewish groups. York Regional Police found that teaching materials at the East End Madrassah in Scarborough, which is linked to an Islamic centre in York Region, attacked Jews and "suggested intolerance," but were not criminal.

Part of the madrassah's curriculum encouraged boys to keep fit for jihad, compared Jews to Nazis, and referred to "Jewish plots and treacheries."

The complaint "prompted change" at the madrassah, CAIR-CAN noted in its letter, adding that the group "welcomes that change."

When police began their probe, the Toronto District School Board, which rented space to the school, revoked its permit and the madrassah had to relocate.

Morsi adopted a practical approach to peacemaking, says former envoy

Morsi can't ignore anti-Israel sentiment in Egypt, but by the same token, Morsi realizes that Egypt's economy is dependent on outside help, Ross said.

The United States will support Egypt's requests for further economic aid if it respects the rights of the Christian Copt minority and of women, and if it preserves a pluralistic political democratic system and hews to its 1979 peace treaty with Israel, he said.

He said Turkey, a rising power in the Middle East, did not play a meaningful role in arranging a truce, because it has downgraded its once-close political relationship with Israel.

Ross predicted that 2013 will be a decisive year in determining whether Israel or the United States go to war to stop Iran's militarized nuclear program.

Before Washington turns to other options on the table, it intends to embark on a last-ditch diplomatic campaign to induce Iran to abandon efforts to build a nuclear arsenal.

U.S. policy, he said, turns not on containing Iran after it becomes a nuclear power, but on preventing Iran from acquiring a nuclear device in the first place.

Claiming that Iran is feeling the brutal effects of international economic sanctions, Ross said its currency and oil exports, accounting for 85 per cent of its revenues, have taken a big hit. Nevertheless, Iran is sticking to its ideological guns in its standoff with the west, said Ross.

In comments on the Arab-Israeli dispute, he said a two-state solution is in Israel's national interest. He pointed out that Israel may lose its Jewish and democratic characteristics if current demographic factors don't change.

He said the real problem between Israel and the Palestinians boils down to "disbelief" – neither side believes the other really wants a two-state solution.

"You have to change the dynamics," said Ross, who was instrumental in helping Israel and the Palestinian Authority reach territorial agreements in 1995 and 1997 and Israel and Jordan sign a peace treaty in 1994.

He outlined a plan to foster a new sense of trust between Israel and the Palestinian Authority:

- Israel should offer compensation to Jewish settlers in the West Bank who leave settlements voluntarily.
- Israel should not build in areas of the West Bank it plans to give up within the parameters of a peace treaty.
- Area C in the West Bank, which fell under full Israeli security control under the 1993 Oslo accords, should be opened to Palestinian economic activity. Israeli military incursions into Area A of the West Bank, which is under Palestinian civil and security administration, should be kept to an absolute minimum.

For their part, the Palestinians can show they're serious about a two-state outcome by placing the map of Israel in school textbooks, government documents and websites.

They should also acknowledge Israel's historical connection to the land, stop hailing suicide bombers as heroes and martyrs, prepare Palestinian public opinion for compromises, replace refugee camps with permanent housing and continue building the institutions for future statehood.

Taking aim at critics who claim that U.S. President Barack Obama is unfriendly toward Israel, Ross said he stoutly defended Israel during Operation Pillar of Defence and has done more than any other president to nurture Washington's security and intelligence alliance with the Jewish state.

"There's nothing more important than security for Israel," he declared.

But like all his predecessors, Obama has had his differences with his Israeli counterpart, he said.

The proper role for U.S. diplomacy in the Middle East is "active engagement," Ross said, adding that the United States cannot impose a solution.

Israeli, Cdn. hospitals unite to raise $1.1M

Compiled by CJN Staff

A partnership between the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation and the North York General Hospital Foundation will help to transform pediatric facilities in Toronto and Jerusalem.

The Bridging Children's Health campaign was created to unite the two hospitals in a shared commitment to improving health care for children, teens and their families, they said in a statement.

The campaign culminated in an event presented by First Capital Realty that featured keynote speaker Rudy Giuliani, former mayor of New York City.

The campaign raised $1.1 million toward the redevelopment of North York General Hospital's child and teen program facility and the construction of the New Generation Building, which houses the Wilf Children's Hospital at the Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem.

Lisa Colt-Cotler, national executive director of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, said "what started as a small seed of an idea between a member of our board and North York General's executive vice-president of philanthropy grew into a successful fundraising initiative. We knew that our donors and friends in the community would embrace this partnership to support pediatric facilities at both hospitals."

The Shaare Zedek Medical is in the final stage of its $60-million campaign to complete the construction of the New Generation Building housing the Wilf Children's Hospital, the most active maternity hospital in the western hemisphere with approximately 15,000 births each year.

The existing pediatric facilities were built nearly 30 years ago and, since 1979, the number of children treated as in-patients has risen by 400 per cent. The New Generation Building is one of the most significant and ambitious projects in Israeli medicine, with its focus on providing maternal, infant and pediatric care together in one facility, she said.

Colt-Cotler said that the $150-million campaign for North York General is the largest comprehensive campaign ever undertaken by a Canadian community hospital and will provide it with the resources to remain a centre for exceptional care and teaching in a diverse community of more than 400,000 people.

The campaign hopes to raise $5 million to redevelop the hospital's child and teen program facility, which will include a greater number of private in-patient rooms, and will provide greater comfort and convenience for children, teens and their families.

The Bridging Children's Health campaign honoured two doctors who have provided extensive contributions to health care.

Dr. Ofer Merin is a cardiothoracic surgeon, lieutenant colonel in the Israel Defence Forces and deputy director general at Shaare Zedek.

He has close ties to Toronto and North York General, having completed his fellowship in Toronto and having led grand rounds at North York General on a recent visit. He was given responsibility for emergency readiness at Shaare Zedek in 2007, and was subsequently appointed as director of the hospital's trauma unit.

As commander of the IDF field hospital over the last 10 years, he has also served as the director of surgical operations in the field hospital that has performed emergency relief in Haiti and Japan following natural disasters.

The second honoree, Dr. Noah Forman, began his career in emergency medicine at North York General Hospital and also serves as medical director for the Toronto Maple Leafs and Toronto Fire Services.

Local donors give $300,000 to Israel cancer research

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Longtime Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) donors Carole and Howard Tanenbaum have pledged $300,000 to the organization over 10 years.

The funds come from the Howard and Carole Tanenbaum Family Charitable Foundation and will enable ICRF to award Carole Tanenbaum Woman of Action Business Award each year at its Woman of Action luncheon.

The luncheon, to be held on April 9 at the Royal York Hotel, recognizes the outstanding achievements of women in business, philanthropy and science.

Carole Tanenbaum, creator of Carole Tanenbaum Vintage Collection, was the honoree in 2007.

"Howard and I are longtime supporters of [ICRF]. This fund enables Israeli scientists to research and discover new ways of detecting and curing cancer," she said.

"As a past honoree it is gratifying to continue to award outstanding women in business for their accomplishments and success. It is my hope that the [award] inspires all women to pursue their goals and follow their dreams."

Money raised through the annual Women of Action luncheon goes to support a number of outstanding ICRF scientists in Israel. Each year, three or four scientists are selected as recipients of the ICRF Woman of Action grants.

ICRF executive director Joy Wagner Arbus said that the donation, part of the ICRF's major gifts initiative, can help increase cancer research.

"It is very meaningful because Carole is a past honoree, and the foundation believes in helping small charities because it catapults what [the charities] are able to do."

ICRF's scientific research has resulted in the development of such drugs as Gleevec, used in the treatment of chronic myelogenous leukemia, and Velcade, a drug developed based on Nobel Prize winning research by ICRF-funded scientists used in the treatment of multiple myeloma.

CHAT grads honour classmate at reunion

Cara Edell

Special to The CJN

The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's class of 2002 recently celebrated its 10-year high school reunion in a bittersweet way.

More than 80 graduates (out of 242), plus their spouses, gathered at TanenbaumCHAT's Wilmington campus on Nov. 15 to shmooze with friends and support a fundraising effort in memory of a former classmate.

Heather Guttman, CHAT's campaign and alumni associate, along with reunion co-chairs Noah Zatzman and Rachel Albert, decided that the event should honour TanenbaumCHAT graduate Darryl Odes, who lost his life to cancer in 2008.

"Rachel, Heather and I decided that donating a shulchan [Torah reading table] to the new chapel [to be built shortly, along with a new addition] on behalf of our grade would be the most meaningful way to remember Darryl," Zatzman said.

"CHAT also reached out to the Odes family, who were touched to hear about the idea and were quite supportive."

Zatzman said he and Albert decided to co-chair the reunion because their years at TanenbaumCHAT were "a definitive time" in their lives. "The lessons learned over the four years, both in and out of class, are still applicable in my life today, 10 years later."

Albert said it was important for her to help plan the event because she wanted to give back to the place and people who supported her during tough times.

"In high school, I was dealing with my mother's illness and her eventual passing, and I was completely overwhelmed by the love I was shown by my classmates and teachers. The CHAT family took care of me."

Zatzman said the event was a huge success.

"Organizing the reunion was so special for me, because it was a way to thank and support the school that taught me so very much, and not just academic. The fact that we have lost a classmate in the last 10 years put things into perspective for all of us. Don't sweat the small stuff."

While many grads could not attend the reunion because they are living abroad (some have made aliyah to Israel), they still supported the cause, Zatzman said.

Three laptops were set up at the party for friends to Skype with people who were absent.

Zatzman said even though the building's structure changed dramatically during his high school years, the energy and spirit that defined his CHAT experience "was still there throughout."

Baird lauds Israel at Ottawa Negev Dinner

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird clearly and unequivocally confirmed the Harper government's commitment to the State of Israel at the Jewish National Fund's (JNF) Ottawa Negev Dinner, where he was the honoree.

The Nov. 20 event had been sold out, with a waiting list, weeks in advance, but it took place against the backdrop of fighting between Israel and Hamas in and around Gaza.

"As we have seen this last week, these are indeed challenging times," Baird told the audience at the National Gallery of Canada. "Hamas is targeting innocent civilians with an onslaught of rockets. It's a despicable act of terror, and yet, as Israel responds, as it has every right to, it is the target of condemnation. Canada, however, stands by Israel's side."

Speaking of his personal, longstanding support of Israel and the Jewish People, Baird described his comfortable, middle-class upbringing in the Ottawa area.

"I've never had to fight a war to defend my right to live in this community. I've never been exiled from my home. I've never had to rebuild my nation. I only point this out by way of contrast to the phoenix-like rising of the modern State of Israel, from a barren desert to the dynamic country we see today."

Baird spoke of what he called the "new antisemitism" which, he said, "targets the Jewish People by targeting the Jewish homeland, as the source of injustice and conflict in the world... just as conventional antisemitism denied Jews the right to live as equal members of humanity, the new antisemitism denies the State of Israel the right to live as an equal member of the international community."

Alluding to criticism from around the world and some Canadians about the government's support for Israel, Baird reiterated his frequent stand that "Canada will not 'go along to get along,'... Canada upholds Israel's right to exist — as a Jewish state — in peace and security. On this point, there is no space for moral equivocation or ambivalence."

Guest speaker Rex Murphy, a CBC radio and TV personality and National Post columnist, expressed his incomprehension and disgust with the treatment of the Jewish People and the State of Israel, after all the suffering of the past.

Citing the many times in history that the Jewish People have been threatened with annihilation, he pondered the existence and resurgence of antisemitism and anti-Israel sentiment.

"What is it about Jews and Israel that so combine to bring about such animus? How can it come to pass that the people injured are in this present moment the only people threatened with extinction again?"

Funds raised at the Negev Dinner will support research and development stations in the Negev.

Numerous MPs, senators and other dignitaries, including Israeli Ambassador Miriam Ziv and former ambassador Alan Baker, also attended the event.

HAMILTON — It was difficult for Emmy Weisz to watch the documentary on Anne Frank.

As a child in Amsterdam, just one year younger than Frank, Weisz had walked the same streets, stepped inside the same buildings as the famed diarist.

But Weisz attended the opening of Anne Frank: A History for Today because she knows it is important to share these stories and educate the community.

The official opening, presented in partnership with Temple Anshe Sholom and the Canada Netherlands Friendship Association, took place Nov. 18.

The opening ceremony also included students from Waterdown District High School and St. Jean de Brebeuf Catholic High School speaking about the exhibits, which were housed at the schools for one month before moving to the temple. Students were trained as docents, and hundreds of community members and students toured the exhibits.

Anne Frank: A History for Today is one of two travelling exhibitions brought to Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom by the Hamilton Jewish Federation Holocaust Education Committee.

The exhibits are on display until Friday, Nov. 30.

Earliest Canadian-made chanukiyah discovered

Compiled by CJN Staff

What is believed to be the earliest known Canadian-made ceremonial chanukiyah has been identified by Eiran Harris, archivist emeritus of Montreal's Jewish Public Library Archives.

It was discovered in the collection of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, Canada's oldest existing Ashkenazi congregation, founded in 1858. The chanukiyah is now prominently displayed in the synagogue's Edward Bronfman Museum.

In 1904, during his presidency of the congregation, Lyon Cohen donated the brass chanukiyah to the synagogue on the occasion of his son's bar mitzvah.

The 40-by-32-centimetre candelabra was cast at the W.R. Cuthbert Brass Foundry, which was owned by the Cohen family. In his youth, prior to achieving international renown as a poet and singer, Lyon Cohen's grandson, Leonard, worked at the foundry, Harris said.

On the base is engraved the following, "Presented to Shaar Hashomayim Congregation by Lyon Cohen, President, on the occasion of the Bar Mitzvah of his eldest son, Chanukah 5665, December 3, 1904."

The eldest son was Nathan "Natty" Bernard Cohen, Leonard's father.

Lyon Cohen would become the first president of Canadian Jewish Congress in 1919.

Harris is confident of his claim. "No

This chanukiyah, made in a Montreal foundry in 1904, is believed to be the first made in Canada.

other older Canadian-made chanukiyah in Canada or anywhere else has been identified," he said.

"Hundreds of Chanukah lamps are displayed in museums throughout the world as examples of ornate Jewish art produced in various countries. Now a Canadian example is also proudly displayed," Harris said.

City's oldest Jewish resident, 109, still gets out

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Sam Baker is beginning to show his age. He uses a walker now. Last time I saw him, maybe a year ago, he was getting by with a cane. He also seems more frail. And his hearing loss has worsened. But, all in all, for a man of nearly 109, he is still doing pretty well.

Although the oldest member of Winnipeg's Jewish community doesn't turn 109 until Dec. 19, the Gwen Selter Creative Living Centre — a largely Jewish drop-in centre where Baker has been a regular for the past 20-odd years — decided to have an early birthday celebration for him on Nov. 14.

The guest of honour was ushered in to the music of Thanks for the Memories, the late Bob Hope's theme song. Hope, like Baker, was born in 1903.

Gwen Selter began the program with a recitation of notable events that happened in 1903, ground-breaking moments such as Orville Wright's first flight, the first transatlantic broadcast from North America to Europe, the first Model A Ford, the first modern-day World Series and the introduction of the teddy bear and Crayola crayons.

Following remarks by his niece, Judy Kaplan (who is also the Gwen Selter Centre's president), Allan (Doc) Selig, Baker's best friend over the past 20 years, and fellow Gwen Selter member David Rosenbaum, Baker thanked the Gwen Selter for the party and reminisced for a few minutes about his good fortune to have reached the age he has in relatively good health and having been blessed with three children, a son and two daughters, three grand children and nine great-grandchildren.

His son, Steven, credits his father's longevity to "a lot of walking."

"Dad used to walk a mile and a half a day until he was 95 or 96 and developed some back trouble. I remember one time when he was in his late 70s that he went for a walk and got caught in a thunderstorm. He called for a ride home. He had walked three miles."

Sam Baker was born aboard a ship as his family was en route to Winnipeg from their native Poland. He was the fifth son of Joe and Zlata Baker. (Two sisters were subsequently born in Winnipeg.)

Baker grew up in West Kildonan (in North Winnipeg). He attended local public schools until the age of 12, when he left school to work in his father's tannery.

In the 1930s, he was involved in various business ventures in rural Saskatchewan with his brothers. In 1942, he bought Jo-Ann Shop, a lingerie store in Brandon, which he converted into a ladies' apparel shop. He later opened a second women's apparel store, Joy's Frocks, in Yorkton, Sask.

Those were busy times. "I would often work 12-hour days," he recalls. "I would come home for supper, then go back to the store to do some bookkeeping."

In 1971, he moved his wife, Joan, and their three children to Winnipeg. He continued to run his store in Brandon, coming home to Winnipeg on the weekends.

He retired in the mid-1980s. His wife, Joan, died in 2002. Sam and Joan were married for 62 years.

Baker still lives in a condominium with his son. He attends services at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue and participates in the Stay Young and Gwen Selter seniors programs on a regular basis.

"I don't go out much in the evenings," he says. "I watch television and read the papers."

He gave up driving 10 years ago. "That was hard," he says. "It was like losing my right hand."

Up until five years ago, he was still travelling to visit his daughters, Michelle and Janice, who live, respectively, in Hamilton and Calgary.

"I am finished travelling," he says. "My daughters and grandchildren will have to come here to see me."

UJA Federation is Everywhere

With over 100 partner agencies and schools, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's reach is farther than you might realize.

On January 31st, 2013, a new initiative to support the young entrepreneurial leaders of Jewish Toronto will be launched. Spearheaded by a cadre of dedicated community members — including Torontonian LLP Partner Cheryl Reicin and social entrepreneur Alexandra Kuperman — Genesis, UJA's Centre for Jewish Innovation, will provide young Jewish adults the opportunity to engage in meaningful, non-profit projects that enrich Jewish life locally and around the globe.

Located downtown, sharing a space with Hillel at the Wolfson Centre for Jewish Campus Life, the centre will offer an incubator to provide five determined social entrepreneurs with UJA Federation's resources, including office space, an annual stipend, and access to programs and professional staff. Genesis will become part of a network of Jewish trendsetters committed to innovation in Jewish learning, social justice, arts, culture and social engagement.

כיפת ברזל

האמריקאים טענו שזה בלתי אפשרי, שזה יקח עשר שנים ושהמחיר יהיה אסטרונומי. זה לקח לרפא"ל שנתיים בלבד בעשירות המחיר, ובשלב זה מצליחה כיפת הברזל לייצר כ-90% מהטילים שנורים עלינו. סיפור ההצלחה של כיפת ברזל הוא חסר תקדים ומרהיב עדות ניצחת ועליונות של היצירות והנחישות הישראלית. עכשיו גדולה נאוות האמריקאים על תמיכתם ואיתה גם האמון שיש להם ביכולותיה של הדמוקרטיה היחידה במזרח התיכון.

ואני סתם עצוב כי אינני רואה איך אפשר לפתור את הבעיה כשממלך ישראל עומדת דיקטטורה איסלאמית אכזרית שאורחיה שלה לא ממש מעניינים אותה, מדינה שמחביאה את לוחמיה בין האזרחים ומתפללת שצה"ל יהרוג את ילדיה כדי שהעולם יראה את התמונות. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Pallywood: the Gaza sequel

The term "Pallywood," a synthesis of "Palestinian" and "Hollywood," refers to dramatically contrived scenes, usually in conflict zones, that are intended to evoke sympathy for Palestinian "victims" of purported Israeli aggression.

Though this genre of Palestinian propaganda was evident as far back as the first Lebanon War in 1982 – but may have manifested even before then – the most blatant and infamous example of such staged brutality found expression during the second intifadah in 2000, with the globally reported "al-Dura incident." This showed graphic filming of a 12-year-old boy, Mohammed al-Dura, cowering behind a concrete cylinder and shielded partially by his father, as the two sought cover after coming under fire in Ramallah.

As the cameras continue to roll, the boy is seen to have been fatally wounded, allegedly from bullets fired by Israel Defence Forces (IDF) soldiers. The resulting footage was first broadcast on French television and then widely distributed, gifting the Palestinians with an instantaneous icon and martyr and stoking the flames of already escalating violence. Only once ballistics experts had examined the evidence did it emerge that the ill-fated boy succumbed to gunfire not from the IDF but rather from Palestinian militia who were present at the time. Even more disturbing was the finding that the entire incident was likely staged – a classic exercise in media manipulation.

With each conflagration in the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, the Pallywood phenomenon adds distortion to an already complex prism. Once revealed, the theatrics seem obvious. What's remarkable, though, is that for news agengated not in Gaza, but in Syria. Another image, also on Twitter, claimed to show an injured Palestinian child who, the caption stated, was "used to Israel terrorism." One tiny problem, though: the child was in fact not Palestinian, but Israeli – and suffering the effects of a Hamas missile attack on her family's home.

Tragic imagery might also translate into patent absurdity in Pallywood tales. A case in point is Honest Reporting's exposé of a video sequence showing a man in an easily noticeable beige jacket who is seen first to be flat on the ground, seemingly wounded after an Israeli airstrike, and then shown to be picked up and carried off by bystanders. Moments later, when the sequence was assumed to be over, we see the same person, obviously uninjured, walking away from the site of his "rescue."

According to the well-worn cliché, "truth is the first casualty of war." Now embedded in Gaza, Pallywood has taken this notion up a notch, while the glib, headline-hungry news media has failed in all too many instances to properly scrutinize their material and separate fact from glaring fiction.

My View

Laurence Hart

cies that voraciously go after the most sensationalist of stories, fundamental source checking goes by the wayside and deceptions that may be recognizable in retrospect become fair game in real time.

The first few days of Israel's recent action to stop Hamas' rocket barrage brought with it a further iteration of Pallywood antics. One of the images doing the rounds on Twitter depicts an image of a distraught father cradling his dead child, an apparent casualty of the Gaza operation. Yes, sadly, the child is dead, only the picture ori-Dreidels: food, song and glory!

Nothing can replace that visceral thrill of spinning your own dreidel. So as Chanukah approaches, that means it's time to get "wrist-ready." And since everything seems to have gone high tech these days, you can try your luck on your computer with some virtual dreidels. I like the delightful one at the Jewish Outreach Institute that also includes the classic rules. [<http://bit.ly/dreidel14>]

Rather than bet on which side their dreidel will come to rest, competitors lusting for the title at the Major League Dreidel Championship vie to see whose tops will spin the longest. You can listen to a report from National Public Radio that takes you to the Spingogue, where teams with names such as Spinola Ryder, Jimmy Gimel, Debbie Does Dreidel and Jew-bacca lay it all on the table. And don't miss the interview with the "knish-ioner" of Major League Dreidel, Eric Pavony, who offers tips to keep your sevivon spinning. [<http://bit.ly/dreidel17>]

I came across a couple of other online game that should please dreidel lovers. The Dreidel Slide Puzzle challenges you to unscramble the pieces to make a picture of a dreidel. [<http://bit.ly/dreidel15>] Once you've solved that, try the elegant yet challenging Dreidel Jigsaw Puzzle. [<http://bit.ly/dreidel16>] (Nicely executed, but I don't quite understand why the photo has a dreidel sitting on a page from Purim's Megillat Esther!)

Although the classic Chanukah foods are lakes and the jelly-filled sufganiyot, there's no reason you can't indulge your passion for dreidels. Try some Candy Dreidels

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

[<http://bit.ly/dreidel18>], Dreidel Cookies [<http://bit.ly/dreidel19>], some Dreidel Toast [<http://bit.ly/dreidel20>] and Fruity Dreidels that make good use of strawberries, bananas and canned pears. [<http://bit.ly/dreidel25>]

When you walk into your Judaica shop and plunk down a buck or two for a brightly coloured plastic dreidel, there's a good chance it came to life not in Jerusalem or Brooklyn but in the Far East. But it wasn't so easy for Tablet Mag's Nick Frisch and Bourrée Lam to find a dreidel manufacturer in Hong Kong. "Mistrust and secrecy are rife in the shadowy world of dreidel production. American importers zealously guard the identities of those Chinese suppliers who provide swindle-free, dependable-quality goods." Read about their quest for an elusive "spin-dice" maker. [<http://bit.ly/dreidel23>]

And don't forget the music. Head over to YouTube for dozens of version of Sevivon Sov Sov Sov [<http://bit.ly/dreidel21>] and Dreidel Dreidel Dreidel [<http://bit.ly/dreidel22>] Proceed with caution if you come across the South Park rendition unless you are quite familiar with the gang that has created this decidedly different version. You've been warned!

Everybody's favourite little dreidel is (we know!) made of clay. But if you want a new dreidel to sing about, look no further than the Hava Nashira Jewish Songleader's Resource. There are dozens of variations of the classic, including:

- I have a little dreidel, I made it from cement! And now our lovely hardwood floor has a nasty dent.
- I have a little dreidel, I made it out of glue! The baby tried to spin it, and now she's spinning, too.
- I have a little dreidel, made from a CD-ROM! It helped me launch a startup called DreidelSpin-dot-com! [<http://bit.ly/dreidel24>]

Don't sweat the small stuff

Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz

We've all experienced what we call the "night before" jitters before an important appointment, simchah, big test or trip. The rush of adrenalin makes it very hard to sleep. The anticipation is often overwhelming.

So we find Jacob the night before a do-or-die situation – his morning encounter with his brother Esau.

Jacob moves the family across the river and divides them into smaller groups, part of his strategy ahead of the historic meeting early the next day. And yet amid all the tumult, Jacob is nowhere to be found, conspicuous in his absence.

I'd have thought that Jacob, concerned husband and father, would be running from camp to camp throughout the night to comfort his family. His presence would have gone a long way to reassure a very scared group.

Perhaps he was steeped in prayer and meditation or was busy putting the final touches on a strategic battle plan.

Not so! "Vayivater Ya'akov leivado" – Jacob went back across the river and remained alone. Rashi explains that he went to retrieve some "pachim ketanim" some small tchatches and utensils he had forgotten. Rashi spins this as favourably as possible, explaining that righteous individuals gain their money with utmost honesty and, therefore, see every item purchased with it to be sacred, so even these small items had sanctity and could not be discarded. Thus, Jacob went to fulfil this mitzvah, leaving him stranded overnight.

I would suggest another lesson. Yes, he became isolated. Yes, he was confronted by an adversary, which resulted in a wrestling match that left him limping. But even more compelling is that these very pachim ketanim almost did him in. We came so close to no Jacob, no Israel!

Rabbinic Reflections

What kept Jacob from his family, from what he should have been doing? His pre-occupation with pachim ketanim – the small stuff almost did him in. Getting stuck on inconsequential stuff leads to isolation, alienation and the crippling of our capacity to succeed where it really counts.

Like us, he loses focus on the real issues of life, namely the well-being of our family and the crucial long term decisions and planning needed in business and family matters. This is the result of our preoccupation with little things that get blown out of proportion. They put us off guard and we lose sight of our real goals as responsible family members and constructive members of a community.

How often has pride or saving face, or a word, tweet, text or action foolishly and hastily said or done, remained our primary focus, thereby allowing relationships and real goals to be lost?

How many times has our insistence on a particular detail – pachim ketanim – killed a good plan or experience? How often have we suffered isolation and alienation just to prove a point? Jacob became Israel when he learned the bitter and painful downside of isolation, and that the world and society exist for more than him alone. He returned home a bit humbled and limping, but he returned to his family and the real issues of the day. The lesson: sweat the big things and forget the small ones. Only then will you accomplish success in life.

Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz is spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Tikvah Ahavat Shalom Nusach Haari in Montreal.

We're not robots in God's hands

As I grow older, I often think of Robert Frost's haunting poem The Road Not Taken.

The poem begins: "Two roads diverged in a yellow wood/ And sorry I could not travel both/ And be one traveller, long I stood/ And looked down one as far as I could/ To where it bent in the undergrowth/ Then took the other."

The poem concludes: "I shall be telling this with a sigh/ Somewhere ages and ages hence/ Two roads diverged in a wood, and I/ I took the one less travelled by/ And that has made all the difference."

There is no escape. A choice is necessary. Before we extend the two roads.

Hesitantly, we decide. Confronted with this dilemma, the baseball player, coach and manager Yogi Berra suggested that "if you come to a fork in the road, take it."

It has been asserted that behind every certainty there stands a concealment, behind every clarity a new mystery is revealed. Assurance and doubt are twin offspring of mystery.

Author Ernestine Ulmer cynically declared, "Life is uncertain, eat dessert first."

One of the most harrowing moments in contemporary literature gives William Styron's novel, Sophie's Choice, its title. It's the moment describing Sophie's choice, the most terrible choice a mother could be asked to make: which of her two children to turn over to Nazi destruction and which to keep alive.

"I can't chose! I can't chose!" she screams again and again. It's only when the unrelenting doctor threatens to murder both her children that she blurts out, "Take the baby! Take my little girl."

Bookmarks

There are strident voices these days that strenuously deny that we are free to make important choices. Some declare that we are the products of our heredity, others affirm that our environment makes what we are.

Judaism affirms that we are free beings. Many things in life are determined, but in moral matters we have free choice to do good or evil. We are not robots in the hands of God or puppets in the iron grip of cause and effect. Novelty, freedom, creativity, spontaneity are realities. Judaism refuses to surrender human freedom. Long ago, the sage Akiba taught, "Everything is foreseen, yet freedom of choice is granted."

But ultimately, the glory and the anguish of being human derive from our ability to choose and direct the course of our lives. It is often tempting to throw up our hands and plead helplessness. But that strategy leads only to defeat and despair. Significant living is always characterized by the knowledge that human will and determination play a decisive role in deciding what kind of person we will become.

In his later years, Frost wrote, "I can sum up everything I've learned about life in three words – 'it goes on.'"

Ultimately, men and women who rest most easily within themselves are those who have chosen a road – by design or lucky incident – that gives them a sense of being needed, of being purposeful, of having found a welcome and necessary niche in society. But how difficult it is to forget that road not taken.

Chanukah Food & Gifts

Bake with olive oil and seasonal fruit

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

Each of our four seasons brings with it a special bounty from which to cull ideas for sweet endings. The holiday of Chanukah also brings with it a unique tradition – we use oil to commemorate the miracle that happened thousands of years ago.

Team these two conditions together and you have an exciting repertoire from which to bake. That was the inspiration behind my Orange Kissed Olive Oil Cake with Orange Caramel Sauce. The cake is made with pure olive oil (for me, extra virgin was a little too fruity and heavy for a cake), lauding the oil that was only supposed to have lit the fire in the Temple for one night, but instead lasted for eight. It also celebrates the fruit available this time of year, delicious, juicy oranges. Orange rind is used in the cake to delicately perfume and flavour it.

Regular and blood oranges are used in the sauce for a vibrant display of colour. Citrus also stars in the Creamy Lemon Bars, a refreshing dessert if there ever was one. Apples (or pears) appear in the versatile babka, a beautiful towering dessert, perfect for after dinner, or the perfect accompaniment to coffee or tea.

APPLE RAISIN BABKA

This babka is equally as delicious made with pears or a combination of apples and pears. If using pears, use just ripe pears, those that yield ever so slightly when pressed. Also, choose apples such as Northern Spy or Golden delicious that will hold their shape when baked.

1/2 cup granulated sugar
1 pkg active dry yeast (or 1 tbsp.)
2/3 cup unsalted butter, softened
3/4 cup milk

2 eggs
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. vanilla
4 cups (approx.) all-purpose flour

Filling:

1/2 cup packed light brown sugar
2 tbsp. ground cinnamon
1 tbsp. grated lemon rind
2 large apples, peeled, cored and chopped (about 2-1/2 cups)

1/2 cup golden raisins
1/2 cup chopped pecans (optional)
Streusel Topping:
2 tbsp. granulated sugar
2 tbsp. brown sugar
1/4 cup all-purpose flour
2 tbsp. unsalted butter
1 egg, lightly beaten

In large bowl, dissolve 1 tablespoon of the sugar in 1/2 cup of warm water. Sprinkle yeast over water and let stand for 10 minutes or until frothy.

Meanwhile, in saucepan set over medium heat, heat together remaining sugar, 1/4 cup of the butter and milk, stirring until butter is melted and sugar is dissolved. Let cool for 5 minutes. Whisk warm milk mixture into yeast mixture along with eggs, salt and vanilla.

Stir in enough of the flour to make a soft, slightly sticky dough. Turn out onto lightly floured work surface. Sprinkling work surface with extra flour as needed to prevent dough from sticking, knead dough for about 10 minutes or until smooth and elastic. Transfer to well-greased bowl, turning to grease all over. Cover and let rise in warm, draft free area until doubled in size, about 1 hour.

Punch down dough. On lightly floured surface, roll dough into 22x10-inch rectangle. Spread surface of dough with remaining butter, leaving 1-inch border along one long side.

Filling: In bowl, stir together brown sugar and cinnamon. Sprinkle over buttered portion of dough. Toss together apples and lemon and sprinkle over brown sugar. Sprinkle with raisins and pecans, if using. Starting at long side without butter, roll up dough jelly-roll style. Pinch bottom edge to seal. Twist ends of roll in opposite directions 6 to 8 times; fit into greased 10-inch tube pan with removable bottom. Cover and let rise in warm draft free area until doubled in bulk, 1 to 1-1/2 hours.

Meanwhile, in bowl, combine granulated sugar, brown sugar and flour. Cut in butter until crumbly. Brush beaten egg all over surface of dough and sprinkle evenly with streusel.

Bake in centre of preheated 350-degree oven for about 40 minutes or until golden brown. Let cool in pan on rack for 10 minutes. Remove from pan; let cool on rack. Serve warm. Makes 20 servings.

ORANGE KISSED OLIVE OIL CAKE WITH ORANGE CARAMEL SAUCE

To help celebrate the miracle of Chanukah, serve this oil-based cake. It's light and moist, and gently redolent of orange. The caramel sauce can be made up to three days in advance.

1-1/4 cups granulated sugar
1-1/4 cups all-purpose flour
1/4 tsp. each baking powder and baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
2 eggs
2 tbsp. finely grated orange rind
3/4 cup pure (not extra virgin) olive oil
3/4 cup regular or soy milk
Orange Caramel Sauce
8 oranges (ideally a combo of navel, cara cara and blood)
1 cup granulated sugar
1 cup fresh orange juice pinch cinnamon
mint leaves

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease 9-in. round cake pan. Line bottom of cake pan with round of parchment paper; set aside.

In bowl, stir together 3/4 cup of the sugar, flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Set aside.

In bowl of stand-up mixer with whisk attachment or using electric beaters, beat together eggs, remaining 1/2 cup of the sugar and orange rind for about 4 minutes or until mixture is light coloured. Slowly, in thin steady stream, beat in olive oil. Whisk in milk. In three separate additions, whisk flour mixture into egg/sugar mixture, making sure each addition is fully incorporated before adding the next. The batter will be quite thin.

Pour mixture into prepared pan. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 35 to 45 minutes or until nicely puffed, golden and cake springs back when lightly pressed on top. Cool in pan on wire rack.

Meanwhile, make caramel sauce. Using a sharp paring knife, cut away skin and white pith from oranges. Cut oranges into rounds. Place in bowl and set aside.

In saucepan set over medium heat, melt sugar. Cook sugar, brushing down inside sides of pan occasionally with pastry brush dipped in water, for about 8 minutes or until the sugar turns a rich, amber colour. Averting face, immediately pour in orange juice. The mixture will bubble up and sputter. Stir in cinnamon. Cook for 5 minutes longer, stirring occasionally, until any solidified caramel has dissolved. Remove from heat and stir in orange segments. Sauce can be covered with plastic wrap and refrigerated for up to 1 day. Bring to room temperature before serving. Slice cake into wedges. Serve with orange caramel sauce. Makes 12 servings.

Tips to make your potato latkes even better

Sheila Jacobson
Special to The CJN

You can use any recipe for potato latkes, but if you follow the tips below when making the latkes, they will turn out to be excellent.

- Use only baking type potatoes, such as Idaho, russets and perhaps, Yukon gold.

- Grate raw potatoes on the large-hole side of a box grater (hand grater) by hand, or in a food processor. Personally, I prefer to grate the potatoes by hand on a hand-crank food grater or a simple box grater. The food processor makes the grated potatoes mushy and watery.

- Place the grated potatoes immediately into ice cold water, to prevent discolouring. The best way to do this is to place ice cold water with ice cubes in a large bowl and put a strainer in the icy water, with the ice cubes on the outside of the strainer. Then put the grated potatoes in the strainer in the ice water so that when you're ready to work with the grated potatoes, all you have to do is pull the strainer out of the ice water. This will strain the grated potatoes and leave the ice cubes behind in the water.

- Squeeze all the water out of the grated potatoes when you're ready to use them. You can do this either by simply squeezing the water out by hand, or by placing the grated potatoes in some muslin cloth, cheesecloth or a small face towel, roll it up and wring it out as you would when hand-washing a small cloth.

- Don't chop the onions in a food processor because it mashes them, no matter what you do, and makes them watery. Even if you don't think they will become so mushy in a food processor, they'll be too mushy for the latkes, and that will make them much too watery to fry well. I always chop my onions by hand with a good old sharp knife. And make sure to chop the onions in a very tiny dice as these distribute more easily.

- Use sweet onions such as Vidalia or Mayan.

- Use rice flour instead of regular wheat flour as called for in your favourite latke recipe, or use 3/4 rice flour and 1/4 regular all purpose wheat flour, or use part rice flour and part cornstarch, the way the Chinese do in coating raw food for frying. The rice flour, as well as cornstarch, make the latkes very crispy, and the starch in the rice flour and cornstarch is more like the starch in the potatoes because neither has any gluten in it, whereas the wheat flour, even all-purpose flour from wheat flour, does have gluten, which can become bitter in the frying process.

'I prefer grapeseed oil for frying' even if you were to strain out the burnt bits of potato from the oil.

In the Middle East and Asia, grapeseed oil and coconut oil are the preferred oils for frying. They both have very high smoke points and can stand very high temperatures for long periods of time without becoming trans fats, as is necessary for frying.

I personally prefer grapeseed oil for frying my latkes, as it is very light in texture and doesn't impart any taste to the food being fried in it, whereas coconut oil can sometimes impart a "coconut" taste to the food.

Coconut oil is also a fairly heavy oil, and it's considered to be a saturated oil because it is firm at room temperature.

In the northern parts of Central Asia (Turkey, etc.) and eastern Europe (Bulgaria, Serbia, Ukraine, etc.), as far north as Poland, sunflower oil is used for frying because sunflowers are plentiful and sunflower oil can be heated to high temperatures without breaking down and becoming a trans fat.

In addition, the lack of gluten in the rice flour and corn starch makes the latkes taste better.

• Try to avoid using olive oil to fry the latkes because it tends to smoke easily and burn, as it has a fairly low smoke point. This will leave a bitter taste on the latkes.

The gift of a year-long Jewish theatre experience

Laura Fixman
Special to the CJN

If you're looking for the perfect gift for your next bar mitzvah or wedding, consider giving the gift of a year-long Jewish theatre experience.

The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company (416-932-9995, hgjewistheatre.com) was started seven years ago by co-artistic directors David Eisner and Avery Saltzman to bring a mix of Jewish theatre to the Toronto community.

"We believe that there's no better way to experience, connect to and feel your Judaism than through incredible live theatre," Eisner said.

Eisner said they try to find a variety of shows, from musicals to dramas to comedies, and that each remarkable season improves upon the last. "We have some of the best talent in the country making that possible." Now, the company has a new home in the Toronto Centre for the Arts, and Eisner is very excited about the location and this season's shows.

Highlights include Falsettos, a musical about the fractured relationships in a family of neurotic New York Jews, and The Whipping Man, a story of a Passover meal shared among Southerners after the U.S. Civil War who had just been freed from slavery.

To produce Falsettos, the company will be partnering with the Acting Up Stage Company, and The Whipping Man will be produced in partnership with the Obsidian Theatre Company. Eisner is thrilled to be working with such excellent Canadian theatre companies, adding that nothing they do could be possible without the support of the Canadian Jewish community.

"[D]onors from the Jewish community understood the importance of allowing people to connect to great theatre," he said.

Eisner said people from all facets of the Jewish community, as well as non-Jews, can connect with the plays they produce. Choosing which plays to produce, they try to encompass all aspects of Jewish theatre, celebrating and embracing all Jewish stories.

"Theatre is a way to build important bridges in our community," Eisner said.

Getting to enjoy an entire season of theatre isn't the only benefit of a subscription to the Harold Green Theatre Company. Subscribers get 15 per cent off additional tickets, plus discounts on local restaurants, venues and parking.

And there's no need to worry about missing a show. If they can't make it to one of the shows, subscribers have three choices: they can pick another night, give their ticket to a friend or family member (at no charge), or receive a tax receipt if it's not possible to attend at all.

Most shows are now staged at the company's new location in the Toronto Centre for the Arts, at 5040 Yonge St. in Toronto. Eisner said that this location is better for their audience than previous productions held at the St. Lawrence Centre.

They also offer the "Conversation on the Green" series, where guests such as Sen. Linda Frum and businessman and philanthropist Aubrey Dan, are interviewed by fashion icon Jeanne Beker about how Jewish culture has influenced their lives and careers.

A subscription to the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company lets recipients keep on enjoying their gift for the entire season after their special event.

"This is a gift that's going to last all year," Eisner said. "You're giving someone the gift of an experience and a chance to connect to their Jewish culture several times throughout the year."

But the promising season ahead isn't enough – the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company is already working on next season's lineup, to be announced in March. Eisner couldn't reveal much at this point, but said he's very excited about the new shows they'll have to offer.

Eisner would recommend a gift subscription to the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company for anyone bar or bat mitzvah age or older.

"There's no better way to build bridges within the Jewish community," he said.

Light up your kids' Chanukah with new books

By Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

For those families who give gifts on each of the eight days of Chanukah, it can be challenging to come up with presents that are fun, cost-effective and relevant to the Festival of Lights. But the release of four new Chanukah titles from Kar-Ben, all with a list price of under $10, may make shopping a little easier this year. Children's literature is a timeless gift that can be fun and educational today and enjoyed by younger siblings when the older kids outgrow them. The new titles cater to three- to 12-year-olds, and those who enjoy crafts and cooking won't be disappointed.

Sesame Street fans will welcome The Count's Hanukkah Countdown by Shalom Sesame, in which Grover tells a story about a Chanukah party with his Israeli friends Avigail and Brosh. The Count is a special guest, and he gets ample opportunity to practice his counting, discovering that everything about the party – from the shopping list to the number of guests – comes to the number eight. He brings eight gifts, takes eight bites of his food and sings eight verses of the Chanukah songs. The Sesame Street team, under authors Tilda Balsey and Ellen Fischer, recount the miracle of the holiday, while bright illustrations by Tom Leigh help bring the story vividly to life.

Every kid loves a dreidel, and in the book Jeremy's Dreidel by Ellie Gellman, they can learn how to make their own. In the story, a dreidel-making workshop at a Jewish community centre catches Jeremy's attention. He and other kids sign up and arrive at the workshop with the items they want to use to craft their dreidels. Jeremy's, a lump of clay, seems the most interesting, and as the other children ask questions, they learn that Jeremy's will be a braille dreidel so that he can play with his father, who is blind.

In the conversation, the kids learn about blindness and its implications, and that Jeremy's father uses a special computer, has a mobile telephone that reads text messages to him and a GPS that helps him navigate areas with which he is unfamiliar.

courage, defiance and Jewish resilience in this family of new immigrants.

The Festival of Lights is also closely connected to food, and those kids who love the kitchen and enjoy helping to prepare food will find Maccabee Meals: Food and Fun for Hanukkah a wonderful resource. The 64-page book caters to a variety of ages and skill levels, with dreidels accompanying each recipe to indicate its level of complexity and whether it is meat, dairy or pareve.

Judye Groner and Madeline Wikler have compiled a fun selection of recipes divided into chapters with recipes suitable for brunch, Shabbat dinner, a pajama party and after-school snacks. Some are simple, like the candle salad with only five ingredients, while others are more complicated, like the cornflake chicken for Shabbat dinner.

The book contains all the usual Chanukah dishes – latkes, sufganiyot and apple sauce, but also some interesting variations, such as Tex-Mex latkes, alef-bet pretzels, carrot latkes and even chicken latkes. The recipes are interspersed with cool facts about Chanukah – historical nuggets and festival facts. Maccabee Meals is a great addition to the recipe bookshelf that will delight young chefs ages five through 12.

cost-effective and relevant to the holiday

"He's a really good listener," Jeremy says, explaining that his father easily recognizes his friends' voices. When the dreidels are finished, the children invite people at the JCC to play with them. The book includes the rules of dreidel games as well as detailed instructions on how to make your own from supplies regularly available around a home.

Emanuel and the Hanukkah Rescue is a picture book best suited to six- to nine-year-olds. Set in New Bedford, Mass., it describes the life of a nine-year-old boy called Emanuel Aguilar, whose family was part of a group of secret Jews that emigrated from Portugal in the 18th century. His father is a merchant who fears any public acknowledgment of his Jewish religion, and despite Emanuel's pleas, refuses to light Chanukah candles, recalling that in Portugal he would have been punished for doing so.

His son is inspired by the tales of whaling and adventures on the open seas he hears from his friend, Captain Henshaw. He dreams of going out to sea on one of the whaling boats, and frustrated by his father's constant fears, defies him by stowing away on one of the ships. He lights Chanukah candles aboard the ship, but when a storm arrives, he learns first-hand what it means to be afraid. The chaos of storm is beautifully depicted by illustrator Jamel Akib, who works in chalk pastels. This thought-provoking story addresses

App teaches kids the Hebrew alphabet

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Three Jewish teachers from Australia have transformed their Jewish educational children's books, called Mish and Mush, into iOS apps for the iPhone, iPod and iPad that have been purchased by people from all around the world.

"Kids absolutely love it," said Shani Diamond, 57, one of the three co-founders of the Mish and Mush books.

"It's an interactive way for them to learn the aleph bet. They can touch on the letters, and they actually say it out loud together," she said. "It's a fantastic teaching tool."

Since the first Mish and Mush book came out 10 years ago, Diamond, along with Nissa Niasoff and Baila Teleshevsky, have printed 25 different stories about these Jewish characters.

"There weren't a lot of books out there for Jewish kids at the time," said Diamond. "We were just sitting one day, the three of us, and... we just brainstormed and these characters came up."

Since launching their iPhone and iPad apps in August, they've had more than 500 downloads from people in countries around the world, and requests to translate the app into Spanish, Russian and Hebrew.

Currently, the iOS app can be downloaded for free, with the option of purchasing additional in-app stories.

In the app, which is geared toward children aged two to six, kids can easily learn the Hebrew alphabet, even choosing Sephardi or Ashkenazi pronunciation, through a story called Let's All Run, Let's All Race, Let's All Catch the Alef Bais, where kids are taken on an adventure to catch the Hebrew letters, which are whizzing around on screen.

Another popular story, called Where Did All These Leaves Come From? explains how God created the world.

"We want to get good morals and good mitzvahs coming across to kids in a fun, loving way," Diamond said. "The main thing is to be educational in a fun way with Jewish themes."

Younger kids can choose to have the story read to them electronically, or they can flip through the pages on their own.

"One of my friends has a little 18-month-old kid and she says 'iPad, iPad' already, and it's just crazy," Diamond said.

The apps also come with a free Mish and Match game for kids to match letters in order to practise the Hebrew alphabet.

Diamond and her team come up with the stories and Niasoff illustrates them, but the hardest part comes after the writing is done.

"We have a Jewish guy in South Africa who does the app work, but he was outsourcing to India, and he wakes up when I'm going to bed, and I'm trying to tell him about the aleph bet," said Diamond. "It was just hilarious. We just do conference calls now."

For these busy mothers and teachers, this is just the beginning. They want to create more apps with Jewish edu-educational games, and they plan to come out with new books in February, including ones for Jewish holidays.

"The feedback is that there are no good educational Jewish games for kids," said Diamond.

She would also love to start creating games to help teach Israeli kids the English alphabet.

"It would be like our aleph bet game, but the reverse, for Hebrew-speaking kids to learn better English," she said.

Hackers target Israel with 44 million cyber attacks

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — From the beginning of Operation Pillar of Defence, hackers worked hard to strike a blow against the Israeli government's computer systems. Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz said recently. No fewer than 44 million attacks were recorded in the first five days of the operation, with nearly all of them failing, thanks to the recent strengthening of computer defence systems in Israel.

Speaking at a special press conference at the Government Computing Center in Jerusalem about the cyber war against Israel that accompanied Hamas' rocket attacks, Steinitz said hackers "are trying to disable the symbols of Israeli sovereignty, to enter websites and install anti-Israel content, thus compromising information and data and damaging the government's ability to serve the public."

Most of the attacks, he said, were against government sites, such as the Prime Minister's Office site, and security-related sites, such as that of the Home Front Command, the body charged with informing Israelis on how to protect themselves in the event of an attack.

Out of those 44 million-plus attacks on government and defence-related sites, said Steinitz, only one succeeded — partially. One site, which he did not name, was "wobbly for a few minutes," but quickly recovered. Even though the government has been successful in warding off hack attacks, Steinitz said that government sites were fully backed up and mirrored, meaning they could be replaced by a duplicate site instantly if the original site was compromised.

So just who is behind the attacks? Steinitz said the government's computing unit had traced many of the attacks to IP addresses in the United States and Europe, and not to Arab countries. While Steinitz could not say whether these hackers were affiliated with Anonymous, the international hacker organization that has pledged to destroy Israel's computing system in solidarity with Palestinians in Gaza, the methods used by the hackers were consistent with the kinds of attacks Anonymous is known for.

Carmela Avner, the government's chief information officer said, "We haven't seen many attempts to enter sites and steal data. Most of the attacks have been of the type where hackers try to overload servers with excessive data," such as in distributed denial of service (DDoS) attacks or "e-mail bomb" attacks, both of which try to overload servers to the extent that they are unable to function.

According to Avner, the website of President Shimon Peres has been a major target of hackers using these methods, with more than 20 million attempted DDoS attacks on the site, all of which have failed.

Other types of common attacks on Israeli sites include hackers pejoratively known as "script kiddies" running prepared scripts looking for security holes. While such attacks have succeeded against sites stored on servers that haven't been updated with the latest security software, government sites are secure from such attacks, Avner.

"We have not closed any sites, but we have prevented access from IP addresses that we determined were problematic," she said.

The government computing unit was informed in advance that the Gaza operation was set to begin, and it shored up defences of sites under its responsibility accordingly.

CLASS ACTS

BACKING ISRAEL: The shinshinim at Robbins Hebrew Academy's Beth Tikvah campus, Ben Yael, left, and Shoval Rosenberg, created signs for the school's Nov. 20 "Red Alert" rally. The entire branch, including staff and students, wore red to show their support for Israel during hostilities with Hamas in Gaza.

SUPPORTING ISRAEL: Through a Skype link with Israel, an assembly of grade 6, 7 and 8 students at Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill campus was able to engage in a real time briefing by Zeev Bielski, a member of Knesset and former mayor of Raanana, on the dangers facing residents under fire from Hamas rockets. Grade 8 student Albert Bloom, left, was among the students posing questions. The assembly also heard from a Sderot resident who was forced to flee northward with his family to the safety of Ramat HaSharon. The live chat was organized by Yehonatan Ben-Ishai, right, one of the school's shinshinim, young Israeli emissaries doing a year of service in Toronto. [David Martosh photo]

York U grad students endorse BDS movement

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Hillel is criticizing York University's Graduate Students' Association (YUGSA) for endorsing the boycott, divestment, and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel in a vote that passed 29 in favour and seven against.

The association released a statement Nov. 16, the day after the measure passed, calling it a "momentous vote." It commits YUGSA to press the university to "withdraw its investments from companies profiting from 'Israeli human rights violations, war crimes and oppression.'"

YUGSA is the third Canadian university student union to pass a motion in favour of BDS this year, following the University of Regina Students' Union last February and Carleton University's Graduate Students' Association in March.

Wangui Kimari, YUGSA vice-president of campaigns, said pro-Palestinian groups at York have long backed the BDS movement, but this is the first time the issue has been brought before the council, which comprises representatives from each department at the university.

The reason it passed now, she said, might have to do with the recent violence between Israel and Gaza.

The council meeting where the vote passed took place Nov. 15, one day after Israel launched Operation Pillar of Defence, although the motion was submitted for the agenda before the war began.

"It's our tuition fees that's contributing to companies that profit from occupation," Kimari said, adding that she personally supported the resolution. "It's tied to human rights, and students have always been at the forefront of human rights issues."

Hillel at York released a statement condemning the motion.

"BDS only serves to promote a toxic and divisive atmosphere on campus. It does nothing to promote civil discourse and will never lead to any true learning or education about the Middle East," Rochelle Derlick, Hillel's vice-president internal said, adding that this type of campaign only intends "to isolate and delegitimize Israel."

Hillel also alleged that the vote did not follow proper procedure, as outlined in YUGSA's constitution, making the motion illegitimate.

"In the [YUGSA] constitution, it requires at least seven days' notice before the meeting of what's going to take place in the meeting," said Tamara Caplan, director of Hillel at York. "That's where we think there might be a violation."

She said Jewish graduate students told Hillel they had not heard about the agenda until the day before the meeting.

However, Kimari said all councillors were given seven days' notice about the agenda, as they are for all meetings. Councillors can then decide whether to send the agenda to the rest of their departments, she said.

But Caplan said she doesn't think the responsibility should fall solely on councillors to publicize YUGSA's meeting agenda to fellow students, especially when such a contentious issue is involved.

"The problem is a lot of these councillors are apathetic and also ignorant of an issue like BDS," she said. "Not even all the councillors showed up to this meeting, and not all of them understood this vote was taking place, so they didn't have the opportunity to vote on behalf of [their] department."

YUGSA president Carolyn Hibbs said her group followed the same process it always uses.

"We've had other types of controversial motions in the past as well, and we don't privilege certain types of motions over others," she said. "We don't decide beforehand what is or is not a controversial motion."

She said that if anybody disagrees with the motion, they can submit another motion to be voted on. However, a two-thirds majority – a supermajority – would be required to reconsider a resolution that has already passed.

At the Nov. 15 meeting, a group of students gave a 30-minute presentation in favour of the motion.

Caplan said she was disappointed that pro-Israel students were denied the chance to give a presentation against the motion, but Hibbs, who chaired the meeting, said they never formally asked for one, and if they had, she would have let council vote on whether to allow them onto the agenda.

Meanwhile, campus anti-Israel groups praised the motion.

"It is important for organizations to not pretend to be neutral while profiting from human rights violations," Mona Ayyoub, a member of Students Against Israeli Apartheid, said in a statement.

Kimari said YUGSA leaders will try to schedule a meeting with York University president Mamdouh Shoukri to let him know that a majority of councillors representing a majority of the departments at York voted for the motion.

In a statement to The C/N on YUGSA's motion, York's administration said that "freedom of expression is one of York University's guiding principles. Members of the York University community have the right to express their views and to test and challenge ideas, provided they do so within the law."

It also said that it uses "best practices" in developing its policy on investments.

"The 'best practice' is built on advice from major investment consulting firms and does not recommend the use of 'negative screening' or divesting from particular companies."

RED BALLOON RALLY: Hundreds showed their support of Israel at a rally in front of the Israeli consulate in Toronto on Nov. 21. The rally was organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto. After a 15-second countdown – representing the time Israelis have to find shelter after a red alert signifying a rocket attack – 99 balloons were released into the air. The balloons referenced the '80s hit song 99 Luftballons. Each balloon had the name of an Israeli city under fire before the ceasefire was put into place earlier that day.

Turkey confirms renewed talks with Israel

Ilan Ben Zion
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu on Sunday confirmed media reports that Ankara and Jerusalem recently engaged in reconciliation talks, despite heightened tension between the two countries over Operation Pillar of Defence.

According to a report published on Sunday in Ha aretz, former Foreign Ministry director Joseph Ciechanover met in Geneva last week with Turkish Foreign Ministry director Feridun Sinirlioglu to discuss ending the diplomatic impasse. The meeting was reportedly supposed to take place weeks ago, but was delayed.

Davutoglu acknowledged the back-channel talks between Israel and Turkey to Turkish daily Today's Zaman, saying they took place prior to Pillar of Defence and were initiated by Jerusalem. Turkey's foreign minister added that Israel must meet Turkey's demands in order for the country to mend ties.

Israel and Turkey enjoyed close diplomatic and business relations for years until a gradual deterioration accelerated over the May 2010 Gaza flotilla incident, in which clashes between pro-Palestinian activists and Israel Defence Forces soldiers aboard the Mavi Marmara resulted in the deaths of nine Turkish citizens and several injured IDF soldiers.

Relations between Ankara and Jerusalem have since remained deeply sour, with Turkey demanding an apology and compensation for the families of those killed as a prerequisite for the renewal of ties. During last week's operation, Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan lambasted Israel, calling it a "terrorist state" for bombarding the Gaza Strip.

"I say that Israel is a terrorist state, and its acts are terrorist acts," Erdogan charged.

Davutoglu said Sunday that Turkey's stance was clear and that its demands were not open to negotiation or discussion. The Netanyahu administration, which sent Ciechanover as an envoy, has thus far refused to accede to Turkey's demands.

A report quoted by Today's Zaman from the Turkish newspaper Yeni Safak — which is closely associated with the ruling Justice and Development Party — indicated that Turkey also demanded that Israel lift the Gaza blockade. According to Yeni Safak, Israel reportedly indicated willingness should Turkey be a guarantor of Hamas non-belligerence. Davutoglu did not comment on the report, and the Israeli Foreign Ministry was not available for comment.

Former Foreign Ministry director Alon Liel told The Times of Israel that "based on the fact that the situation inside Egypt is unstable again, the talks with Turkey are becoming extremely important. I believe that the possibility for an Israeli apology will emerge after the January 2013 elections."

"The whole Gaza blockade issue looks different now after the recent ceasefire agreement with the Hamas, and this might enable a breakthrough," Liel, a former Israeli ambassador to Turkey, added.

Contrary to suggestions that Turkey was sidelined during the Egyptian-mediated ceasefire talks that ended Operation Pillar of Defence, Davutoglu said that "Turkey took an active part in the process. There was contact with the Israeli side to end the fighting in Gaza, which was causing human suffering. If there is a possibility to end a human tragedy, Turkey will talk with anybody."

Davutoglu's admission of contact with Israel outside the framework of Gaza ceasefire talks contradicted Erdogan's statement at the beginning of Pillar of Defence that "there is no such thing as 'our relations'" with Israel.

Koby Leon training for the Paralympics in London 2012.

A Silver Medalist's Story

December 24, 1996 — the day the world fell apart for Koby Leon. While serving as a soldier in the "Egoz" Special Operations Unit in Southern Lebanon, a roadside bomb laid by Hezbollah exploded. Members of his combat force were killed instantly. Koby was critically wounded. He sustained a spinal injury which left him paralyzed. He was only 20 years old.

With Koby's strong determination and the support and rehabilitation that he received at Beit Halochem Tel Aviv, he now walks with crutches. He also participates in many specialized activities that our centre offers.

"Beit Halochem has become my second home. It is a place where I feel comfortable and can fit in. The therapy that I receive there has helped to restore my muscle strength and confidence. I particularly enjoy the different sport activities offered like sailing, basketball, swimming, tennis and especially hand-biking, which changed my life."

“There's a great feeling of being able to give something back to your country.”

Koby started to cycle competitively. The dream of racing at the London Paralympics became a serious possibility, requiring a great investment of time and intensive training.

And it paid off with the unbelievable win! Koby Leon captured the silver medal for hand-bike racing at the 2012 London Paralympics!

Thanks to the support and dedication of the coaches and staff from Beit Halochem's cycling program, Koby was able to realize his dream.

Beit Halochem Centres in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem, Nahariya and Beer Sheva offer a broad array of specialized therapies, sports programs, cultural and social activities enabling our 51,000 Wounded Heroes to return to meaningful and productive lives.

Please ASSIST the more than 51,000 disabled war veterans and victims of terror who turn to Beit Halochem for their rehabilitation.

Cautious praise for ceasefire

Andy Levy-Aizenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canadian officials last week offered cautious praise for the fragile ceasefire between Israel and Hamas brokered by Egypt.

In separate statements released on Nov. 21, representatives of the Conservative government, the Opposition NDP and the Liberal party all praised the ceasefire.

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird said he hopes "terrorist cells" in Gaza will abide by the agreement.

"We are deeply concerned about the loss of innocent lives on both sides and hope this agreement will end the fear, violence and death of the past days," he said.

"In my conversations with regional ambassadors and counterparts," Baird added, "I have reiterated Canada's support for Israel's right to defend itself against terrorism, which, in all its forms, must be wholly rejected by all peace-loving people around the world. Canada appreciates the concerted efforts taken by the Egyptian government, with the support of others, to mediate the ceasefire agreement."

On his Twitter feed, NDP foreign affairs critic Paul Dewar said the following on Nov. 21: "We welcome ceasefire agreement in Mideast, thank the countries that worked hard to reach it & urge all to move towards comprehensive peace."

Liberal Interim Leader Bob Rae said he hoped the ceasefire could lead to peace and "an end to all terrorist attacks... and the guarantee of the safety and security of citizens of the region."

"Our thoughts go out to the families of civilians who have been killed and injured in Israel and Gaza during this challenging time."

David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CJIA) said he is happy for the residents of Israel who can now experience their "first nights of secure and uninterrupted sleep" since Hamas' rocket barrage began.

"Our hope is that the days ahead will mark the beginning of a long period of quiet," Koschitzky said in a Nov. 21 statement.

David Koschitzky

"The immediate goals of Israel's military response have been achieved, but the real test will be whether Egypt and others in the region take serious measures to prevent the rearming of Hamas and other terror groups in Gaza. With Iran's substantial backing, Hamas and its affiliates have become the single greatest obstacle to a peace that would benefit Israelis and Palestinians alike. It is imperative that the international community redouble its efforts to counter Iran's support for terrorism, and to compel Hamas to abandon the path of violence."

Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies president and CEO Avi Benlolo said he is "cautiously optimistic" about the ceasefire but fears Hamas, an organization that, he said, "joyfully celebrated the pain and suffering of Israeli citizens" has not finished terrorizing Israelis.

"I absolutely do not envy the Israelis who are trying to make peace with those who rejoice in suffering and death," Benlolo said.

Reports out of Israel last week noted that there were celebratory gatherings in the streets of Gaza, with Hamas claiming victory in the recent conflict.

However, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak last Thursday dismissed the victory celebrations.

Speaking on Israeli television, Barak said the Hamas government is deceiving its populace with fabricated achievements.

"They [Hamas] are deceiving their own people. They are celebrating the downing of an F-16 [which did not happen] and rockets that supposedly exploded in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. They know full well what has befallen them: the prime minister's official residence is gone, their manufacturing infrastructure is gone, no heavy machinery, they now have less than 40 per cent of the medium-range rockets they once possessed, and a buried military chief," Barak said, according to Israel Hayom.

In a Nov. 24 interview with Associated Press, Moussa Abu Marzouk, a senior Hamas official, said his organization would not stop smuggling and developing weapons even though that was a stipulation of the current negotiated ceasefire agreement with Israel.

"There is no way to relinquish weapons," Abu Marzouk said in the interview. "These weapons protected us and there is no way to stop obtaining and manufacturing them."

The agreement calls on Hamas and Israel to cease all forms of military activity, including Israel's targeted killings of terrorists. It also calls for an easing of the Israeli-Egyptian blockade of Gaza.

On Saturday, a Muslim imam in Gaza issued a religious edict, or fatwa, that said it is a sin to violate the ceasefire between Israel and Hamas.

Imam Suleiman Daya issued the fatwa, according to Ha'aretz, after Abu Marzouk made his comments.

"Honoring the truce, which was sponsored by our Egyptian brethren, is the duty of each and every one of us," Daya said in his edict. "Violating it shall constitute a sin."

Ismail Haniyeh, prime minister of the Hamas government in Gaza, said: "We are satisfied and proud of this [ceasefire] agreement and at the steadfastness of our people and their resistance."

He said it was Egypt's unwavering support and the Arab Spring that gave them the strength to emerge victorious. "Israel was defeated and now they know the rules have changed."

Netanyahu said he "respects" Barak's decision to retire from political life. He thanked Barak for "co-operation in the government," adding that he "greatly esteems Barak's contributions over many years to the security of the state," according to a statement published by his office.

Barak told the press he would be open to staying on as defence minister in the next government if appointed and said he would always be available to advise future governments on matters of defence and national security.

While non-elected officials can fill nearly all ministerial posts in a "professional" capacity, it is unlikely Netanyahu, who is expected to handily win the next election, will keep Barak on, given likely pressure from the right flank for a more hard-line head of the Defence Ministry.

However, Barak proved a popular defence minister, even if his political fortunes have waned with time. His independence party, which he formed in a surprise 2010 move in the wake of an internal rift with Labor, was expected to gain three seats at most in upcoming elections, with some polls showing it unable to even enter the Knesset.

Barak said he supports the remaining members of the party in their campaigns for the coming elections, but would not be drawn into predictions about or evaluations of those still left in the race. He also remained tight-lipped when asked about the negotiations he has held with other parties and political personalities with whom he has been linked.

Rumours had surfaced that he was in talks with former Kadima head Tzipi Livni to form a new party.

Other reports over the past several months had Barak joining the Likud party, which would have been a rightward turn for the once-dovish minister, but Likud party members reportedly opposed the possibility.

Ynet had reported that Barak was asked by Netanyahu to resign his post if he planned on joining another party.

Barak's stepping down likely paves the way for former army chief Moshe Yaalon, currently strategic affairs minister for Likud, to become defence minister, as has long been rumoured. Current opposition head Shaul Mofaz, a former defence minister, may also be gunning for the post.

At once hailed by the left and demonized by the right for being willing to compromise with the Palestinians, Barak proved a polarizing, albeit flexible, leader. His drift at the end of his career toward Netanyahu, who is seen as a security hawk, pushed him away from the Labor rank and file.

Right-wing politicians reacted happily to the news of the planned resignation, while there was a more mixed response on the left.

Born on a kibbutz in 1942, Barak was central to the early successes of the Israel Defence Forces' most elite commando unit, Sayeret Matkal, and is the most decorated soldier in Israeli army history, having taken part in a number of daring raids that earned him a reputation as a defence stalwart.

He entered politics with the left-wing Labor party in the mid-1990s and succeeded Netanyahu as prime minister in 1999, serving concurrently as defence minister.

As prime minister, presenting himself as a successor to the assassinated Labor prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, he sought to conclude a permanent peace accord with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, initiating and participating in 2000's abortive negotiations at Camp David hosted by U.S. president Bill Clinton.

Rebuffed by Arafat after offering an Israeli withdrawal from almost all of the West Bank, Barak later said he had "removed the mask" from Arafat, exposing the Palestinian leader as unwilling to agree to the compromises necessary for a viable two-state solution. Nonetheless, Barak remained committed to advancing talks with the Palestinians and was trounced in elections in 2001 by the hard-liner Ariel Sharon, forcing Barak out of politics.

Iran moves quickly to rearm Gaza

The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Less than a week after the conclusion of Operation Pillar of Defence, and with Hamas boasting of an imminent increase in military aid from Iran, Israeli satellites have spotted a ship at the Iranian port of Bandar Abbas being loaded with rockets and other military supplies ostensibly bound for Gaza, the British Sunday Times reported.

The report cites Israeli intelligence sources who surmised that the cargo, loaded a week ago, would be shipped to Sudan and from there smuggled over land to Gaza.

According to the report, the cargo may include Fajr-3 rockets of the likes already fired by Hamas during the recent conflict, and whose stocks were reportedly depleted by Israeli bombings. Also possibly included were components of Shahab-3 ballistic missiles, which could be stationed in Sudan and used as a direct threat to Israel.

"With a lot of effort, Iran has skilfully built a strategic arm pointing at Israel from the south," an Israeli source was quoted as saying.

In late October, Khartoum blamed Israel for an apparent airstrike on the Yarmouk Complex, a Sudanese military factory, in which two people were killed.

Israeli officials have neither confirmed nor denied involvement in the attack.

In the past, Israel has accused Sudan of serving as a conduit for arms shipments from Iran through Egypt to Hamas in Gaza. The attack on the Yarmouk Complex was believed to be connected to this suspicion.

Israeli Arab arrested for bombing

An Israeli-Arab from Taybeh and several other Palestinians from the West Bank were arrested Nov. 21 for their alleged role in the Tel Aviv bus bombing that wounded 28 people that day. After a manhunt lasting several hours that caused major disruptions across the country, the Israel Security Agency (Shin Bet) caught the suspects that night in a joint operation with the Israel Police and the IDF. Law enforcement officials say the Taybeh man and his handlers were part of a terror cell with links to Hamas and the Palestinian Islamic Jihad. In their preliminary interrogation, the suspects confessed, saying they chose the venue for the attack and prepared the cellphone-activated explosive device.

Soldier dies of wounds

An Israeli soldier injured in a mortar attack on southern Israel has died. Lt. Boris Yarmulnik, 28, of Netanya, who was critically wounded Nov. 21 after a rocket fired from Gaza landed in the Eshkol Regional Council, died Nov. 22 of his injuries. Yarmulnik was critically wounded and five other soldiers moderately wounded in the last day of Israel's Operation Pillar of Defence against Gaza. His death brings to six the number of Israelis killed during the eight-day operation, four civilians and two soldiers. A ceasefire went into effect at 9 p.m. local time on Nov. 21. Some 13 rockets were fired from Gaza after the ceasefire went into effect. Ten of them landed inside of Gaza. Schools remained closed on Nov. 22 in communities located up to 25 miles from the Gaza border.

Canadians Help Negev Kids

The Jewish Agency for Israel took 9,000 children and teenagers from southern Israel for a day of fun Nov. 22. The children and teenagers visited entertainment venues in the centre and north of the country, following eight days of nearly constant rocket bombardment from Gaza during Israel's Operation Pillar of Defence. The costs for the respite activities were paid by the Jewish Federations in North America, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Federation CJA and the Jewish Federations of Canada-UJA. Nearly 30,000 children in total were taken for rest and respite out of rocket range last week by the Jewish Agency.

At 43, Ben-Gurion U comes into its own

David Lazarus

BE'ER SHEVA, Israel — The gradual but steady rise to renown of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU), situated in Be'er Sheva, the geographical heart of Israel and capital of the Negev, has had as much to do with its spare and majestic surroundings as its world-class academics and research.

That became clear during a weeklong media mission hosted by BGU, which is only 43 years old, just days before troubles in Gaza escalated.

The media mission, it was emphasized during our numerous meetings with BGU officials, could serve through its coverage to underscore the institution's inextricable and symbiotic ties to a region that craves water and must make the most out of the little it has through ingenuity and genius.

Drip irrigation, which allows vegetation to flourish through a specialized system feeding it drop by drop, was developed at BGU.

The university is flourishing as an academic research centre, seven-year BGU president Rivka Carmi informed mission participants, despite still lacking the "superstar" status enjoyed by older, more venerable Israeli institutions such as Hebrew University in Jerusalem, the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot and Technion in Haifa.

Part of it is because of BGU's relatively young age, she said, and the other reason is geography.

"It is difficult to compete," Carmi said.

"We are the youngest kid on the block."

She said unique to BGU has been its mandate, which, as Israel's iconic founder David Ben-Gurion dreamed, remains to "spearhead the development of the Negev," an area making up 60 per cent of Israel proper.

Ben-Gurion, agreed Faye Birtker, BGU's 13-year director of media relations, might be disappointed if he were alive today, at least as far as general interest in the Negev on the part of Israelis is concerned.

While BGU and the region have flourished immeasurably compared to a half-century ago, which would have thrilled "the old man," Birtker acknowledged, the Negev, because of its desert environment and distance from major Israeli cities, is no magnet. It continues to be perceived as too far away from the real action, even though Tel Aviv is less than 90 minutes away by car.

But by all appearances, based on activities at BGU's bustling main Marcus Family Campus in Be'er Sheva, this feeling is decidedly not shared by its 20,000 students, or by Israeli officials, which appears to finally be giving BGU its due. The university has more students residing on campus than any other Israeli institution of higher learning, and BGU and its students make a concerted effort to reach out to the general Be'er Sheva and Negev communities, as well as to the region's indigenous Bedouin community, through a variety of volunteer programs.

"BGU has the highest level of volunteerism of any Israeli university," Birtker informed us.

Ben-Gurion University of the Negev president Rivka Carmi

It was also made clear that were it not for the presence of BGU, sculpted with just the right touch of esthetic seamlessness into the stark Negev landscape on five campuses, there would be no modern-day Be'er Sheva, a university town of 200,000.

Carmi indicated to the media mission and repeated in her annual report that BGU has finally appeared to have reached a "tipping point" in terms of the Negev region and higher education finally receiving "long overdue recognition."

Israel's Council for Higher Education, which operates under the Education Ministry, delivered to BGU a higher percentage increase in budget allocation than any other university.

Carmi explained that this was due in large measure to BGU's imaginative, cutting-edge research on so many fronts, among them information technology and applied and environmental research.

As part of its program, the media mission attended a fourth biannual, four-day international conference on "Drylands, Deserts and Desertification" at BGU's Jacob Blaustein Institute for Desert Research at Sde Boker campus, which drew 400 of the world's top researchers as well as many graduate students. All were determined to find new, innovative ways to halt encroaching enlargement of desert areas — "desertification" — as well as to harness the power of the sun for electricity and address a multitude of other issues related to "dryland" environments and achieving "sustainable" living conditions on all types of terrain.

According to BGU's annual report, the university has also launched a five-year plan anticipating growth in fields such as renewable energy, regenerative medicine, stem cell therapy and homeland security, while also relying on its "core strengths": solar energy, agriculture, water research and cognitive science.

Carmi informed the media mission that BGU is also helping to implement a plan to move Israeli Defence Forces basic training to the Negev, with construction also having begun on its Advanced Technologies Park that is planned to house high-tech companies like Deutsche Telekom.

As a result of this type of investment, a "Silicon Wadi" is being created adjacent to the university, BGU's annual report said.

"This is the future," Carmi said. "We've invested $20 million into the Technology Park — all part of Israel as a 'startup nation.'"

During our six days at BGU, it was the sheer diversity and scope of the academics and research projects — from the humanities and medical school to the sciences, the environment and information technologies — that stood out for the mission:

- At the faculty of health sciences, doctors Lior Aharonson-Daniel and Bruria Adini were conducting research studies on emergency preparedness response and trying to scientifically measure "community resilience" to emergency or catastrophic situations.

- Later the same day, Prof. Iris Shai showed the mission the correlations between levels of visceral and subcutaneous fat (the former being "far worse" for us, her research indicates).

- In the same building, professors Smadar Cohen and Roby Granek demonstrated research that could arguably win BGU its first Nobel Prize: a way to heal heart tissue damaged by a heart attack using a "bio-material device" derived from algae deliverable by injection. BGU has received about $10 million to further develop it.

- Meanwhile, in the polymer lab, physicist Rafi Shekler, alit with the yellow glow of his dust-free lab, demonstrated how he could print solar cells onto plastics, which would prove useful because of polymers' ability to conduct electricity.

- At the Ben-Gurion National Solar Energy Centre at Sde Boker campus, Shoshana Dann showed how a state-of-the-art solar dish could be used to provide heat, light and hot water to 25 families.

There were many other examples during the course of the trip.

The media mission spent the day prior to departure travelling through the Negev desert visiting so-called "ecotourism" sites, among them wineries that use brackish (salty) water to make a very acceptable Merlot, as well as a solar energy park, the ruins of the ancient Byzantine Nabatean town of Shivta, and a desert lodge built almost single-handedly by one man.

Carmi told participants that BGU's future looked brilliantly bright.

"We are known all over the world," she said, "in Australia, Africa, China."

"We have a brand," she said, adding that BGU, established only in 1969, only four years before Ben-Gurion's death, has truly come into its own, fulfilling the vision he had 21 years earlier when the Jewish state was born.

David Lazarus took part in the media mission as a guest of BGU.

Tarzan and the Holocaust

Rafael Medoff
JNS.org

Like North American boys and girls, youngsters growing up in British Mandatory Palestine or the new State of Israel experienced thrills through the adventures of Tarzan, the immortal Edgar Rice Burroughs character whose 100th anniversary was celebrated last month.

American Tarzan movies with Hebrew subtitles attracted standing-room-only audiences, and Hebrew writers churned out a torrent of unauthorized Tarzan stories, sometimes with a Zionist twist – such as Tarzan helping to smuggle Jewish refugees from Hitler's Europe to Palestine.

But the writers and their readers alike would have been very surprised to learn that one of the Tarzan movie producers was actually involved in sponsoring the real-life rescue of Jews from the Nazis.

Tarzan of the Apes debuted in the October 1912 issue of The All-Story, an early pulp magazine. Tarzan of the Apes was only the third story ever written by Burroughs, a 36-year-old pencil-sharpener salesman who, after reading a number of pulps, concluded – as he later recalled – “If other people got money for writing such stuff, I might, too, for I was sure I could write stories just as rotten as theirs.”

The story of the English infant raised by apes in Africa was so successful that Burroughs authored more than a dozen more Tarzan novels in the years to follow. The character soon made his way to Hollywood, with the first Tarzan film appearing in 1918, starring Elmo Lincoln.

But it was the portrayal of the Lord of the Jungle by swimming champion Johnny Weissmuller that brought Tarzan to the pinnacle of international renown. Born in Hungary to ethnic German parents in 1904, Weissmuller was, according to some sources, of partial Jewish descent. As a child growing up in Chicago, he contracted polio and took up swimming to counter the effects of the disease. His athletic prowess brought him to the attention of William Bachrach, a Jewish swimming coach who became Weissmuller's mentor.

Weissmuller set numerous world records and won five gold medals at the 1924 and 1928 Olympics.

From 1932 to 1948, he starred in 12 Tarzan movies. They were hugely popular, not only in the United States, but also around the world. “As a boy in Tel Aviv, I saw every one of them, sometimes more than once,” says the award-winning Israeli filmmaker Moshe Levinson. “My friends and I also gobbled up the short Hebrew-language Tarzan books that came out almost every week. We loudly imitated his famous ‘jungle roar,’ although the neighbours weren’t always happy about that. We just couldn’t get enough of Tarzan.”

Levinson recalls that many of the Hebrew Tarzan stories were written by young authors who would later emerge as giants of the Israeli literary world. “People like Amos Oz, Amos Keinan and Yeshayahu Levi were moonlighting – they needed to pay the rent while they were waiting for their big break, so they wrote these Tarzan stories under pseudonyms, glorifying a character who was deeply rooted in nature, vibrant, unafraid, scornful of the intellectual life,” he says. “That was how they wanted the new Israeli society to look, and it had a big impact on us kids.”

The fact that many Jews in Mandatory Palestine mistakenly believed Weissmuller was Jewish further added to Tarzan's popularity in the Holy Land. Eli Eshed, Israel's foremost Tarzan expert, notes that Oz, in his autobiographical stories, depicts himself as an avid Tarzan fan. Oz wrote that his parents “were very proud that Johnny Weissmuller, the real Tarzan, is a Jew... Tarzan for us was a Jew since he always fights as ‘one against many’ and because he was smart and full of tricks and his enemies were stupid.”

About 7,500 miles away, a handful of Jewish activists were looking for donors in Hollywood to help bankroll the Aliyah Bet operations. Hillel Kook (using the name Peter Bergson), Yitshaq Ben-Ami, Samuel Merlin and Alex Rafaleli, followers of the Revisionist Zionist leader Ze'ev Jabotinsky and members of the Irgun, had been sent by Jabotinsky to the United States between 1938 and 1940 to seek financial and political support for Aliyah Bet and the creation of a Jewish state. Their organization, known at that point as American Friends of a Jewish Palestine, later was popularly known as the Bergson Group. And Hollywood would prove to be one of their most important bases of support.

Although there were many Jews among Tinseltown's film directors, writers and actors, some changed their names and hid their Jewish identity in order to advance their careers in the movie industry. Rafaeli later wrote of his surprise and disappointment to find many Jewish actors “aloof and uninterested in their people's fate.”

But others were more responsive to the young Zionists' appeals. An early and important supporter was Bernard P. Fineman. A Hollywood figure of some prominence, Fineman had produced movies featuring such stars as Gary Cooper (Wolf Song, 1929) and Lucille Ball (Beauty for the Asking, 1939). In addition, his first wife, Margaret, was the niece of legendary director Cecil B. DeMille. Fineman's Tarzan connection was as the producer of the fifth of the 12 Weissmuller films, Tarzan's Secret Treasure, which was released in 1941.

The plot was boiler-plate Tarzan: Boy – Tarzan and Jane's adopted son – stumbles on gold at the bottom of a river. Members of a British expedition, learning of Boy's discovery, kidnap him and Jane in order to force Tarzan to reveal the location of the treasure. Eluding crocodiles and aided by a herd of friendly elephants, Tarzan comes to their rescue. Like all of the Tarzan adventures, Secret Treasure was a box-office success.

At the very moment Fineman was working on Tarzan's Secret Treasure, he was actively assisting the real-life adventures of Aliyah Bet (illegal Jewish immigration to Palestine). Not only did the Tarzan producer provide financial support for the American Friends of a Jewish Palestine, but he also did for them what Hollywood types do best – networking. He introduced them to important potential supporters, including the actor Edward G. Robinson, Fineman's sister, the journalist Frances Gunther and her husband, John.

John, the future author of Death Be Not Proud. It was Gunther who coined the term “Jew-running” to describe the Irgun's refugee-smuggling operations. Robinson later starred in a dramatic pageant about the plight of the Jews, We Will Never Die, that the Bergson Group staged at Madison Square Garden. The Gunthers became pillars of the rescue movement, with Frances serving as treasurer, spokesperson and fundraiser. She even testified in Congress for a Bergson-initiated resolution on rescue.

Some of the Hebrew-language Tarzan knock-offs found the Lord of the Jungle doing things that Jews were unable to achieve, such as tracking down Nazi war criminals Martin Bormann and Rudolf Hess. Such Tarzan stories substituted fantasy for unattainable reality. But in the case of Aliyah Bet, young Jewish activists took matters into their own hands and changed the course of history for tens of thousands of Jewish refugees. And a Tarzan movie producer, of all people, was part of the team that made it possible.

A sweeping account of the history of Jerusalem

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

British historian Simon Sebag Montefiore has written what is probably the most definitive popular account about Jerusalem.

Spanning the centuries, Jerusalem (Alfred A. Knopf) leaves nothing unturned and runs to more than 600 pages, excluding illustrations.

The author, a descendant of Sir Moses Montefiore, a 19th-century benefactor of the city, has researched the topic in meticulous detail, drawing on current scholarship, his own family papers and recently opened archives. Having judiciously sifted through this mountain of voluminous information, Montefiore has produced a sweeping and exhaustive book that does justice to the subject.

He examines the historical role that David played in the conquest of Jerusalem from the Jebusites. From here, he segues to Nebuchadnezzar, the Babylonian king who plundered and obliterated Jerusalem.

Antiochus slaughtered thousands of its inhabitants and ordered the temple to be soiled with pig's flesh, an event Montefiore writes about at length.

Examining the Roman period, he delves into Pompey's destruction of the city's fortifications and murder of 12,000 of its residents.

Neither the Crusaders nor Saladin spared the rod in subduing Jerusalem, as Montefiore points out.

When the Mamluks arrived in 1399, Jerusalem, with a population of only 6,000, was in a perilous state. The Mamluks were driven out by the Turkish Ottomans in 1517, and for the next four centuries, the city was ruled by them.

Ottoman governors so repressed Palestine that a revolt broke out. It was ruthlessly crushed, with the severed heads of its leaders used to decorate the walls of Jerusalem.

On a more positive note, Montefiore introduces readers to his ancestors, the first of a new breed of wealthy and powerful European Jews who offered assistance to their mainly impoverished brethren in Jerusalem.

Montefiore shows how foreign powers advanced their respective interests in the Middle East by meddling in the internal affairs of Jerusalem. The British protected the Jews, the French protected the Catholics and the Russians protected the Eastern Orthodox.

However exalted and ethereal Jerusalem appeared to its inhabitants, they had to endure the weight of endemic poverty. Passing through the city in 1854, the German political theoretician Karl Marx lamented the condition of Jews.

"None equals the misery and suffering of the Jews [in] Jerusalem," he wrote in a dispatch for the New York Daily Tribune. Jews inhabited "the most filthy quarter," were the "constant object of Muslim oppression and intolerance," were "insulted" by the Greeks and were "persecuted" by the Latins.

With rhetorical flourish, Montefiore recreates Theodor Herzl's uneventful meeting with the German kaiser in Jerusalem in the late 1890s.

Writing of the World War I period, he quotes from the diary of a young German soldier who had been sent to fight the British in Palestine. The diarist is none other than Rudolf Hoess, the future commander of the Auschwitz death camp.

Moving forward, Montefiore describes Gen. Edmund

Allenby's military campaign that culminated with the capture of Jerusalem.

Britain's first high commissioner in Palestine, Sir Herbert Samuel, a Jew, arrived in Jerusalem resplendent in a white uniform, a pith helmet with feathers and a sword, the very picture of a European colonial administrator.

In a picturesque sketch of 1930s Jerusalem, Montefiore fixes his gaze upon the King David Hotel, the city's first world-class hospitality.

He dwells on the first Arab-Israeli war, saying that overconfident Arab commanders expected Jerusalem to fall into their hands quite easily because of their dismissive view of Jews as submissive subjects under Muslim rule.

Montefiore surveys the battles that convulsed Jerusalem, giving readers a bird's eye of them.

He reminds us that Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Dayan, being none too eager to take responsibility for governing the Temple Mount, was reluctant to conquer the eastern part of Jerusalem. He was overruled, and Jerusalem was reunited as a city, much to the chagrin of the Palestinians.

Montefiore takes the story of Jerusalem to 2010, explaining what positions Israeli political parties have adopted with respect to the status and future of the city.

Cary Fagan brings Toronto into view

In what was once a much-anthologized short story, Norman Levine wrote of a Canadian writer living in England this way: "I remember best the cold, damp winter days with the fog thick – you could just see the traffic lights – and then going inside and having some hot wine by the open fire and talking about writing, what we were writing, and where we had things out. We used to send out stories, optimistically to the 'name' magazines. But that was like taking a ticket in a lottery. It was the little magazines who published us who gave encouragement and kept us going."

We All Begin in a Little Magazine was Levine's story's affirmative title. The acknowledgment page of Cary Fagan's new story collection confirms that writers continue to build their careers, their community and their sense of their own work by submitting work to little magazines. The stories in Fagan's My Life Among the Apes (Cormorant) appeared first in The Antigoni Review, Fiddlehead, Taddle Creek and Grain, finding appreciative editors and audiences from the East Coast to the West Coast.

Fagan is Toronto-based, a family man with deep dedication to musical performance. His oeuvre has developed in a variety of directions. He has published novels and story collections aimed at an adult audience, and numerous titles for both young children and adolescent readers. He is extremely prolific in his writing for youth and has developed fruitful collaborations with some of Canada's finest book illustrators. His adult novels focus on themes of Jewish ancestry and identity, but his work often handles such themes lightly, with ambiguity, and readers might first notice his close attention to the challenges of family life, to the professional and personal risks of big-city life, especially in his native Toronto.

It's often said (especially by Montrealers) that Jewish Toronto lacks its bard, a singer of the city whose goal is to focus on street life and shifting identities as Mordecai Richler did for Montreal. One of the lovely aspects of the stories in My Life Among the Apes is the manner in which Fagan brings Toronto into view as a city of tightly built downtown streets and of sprawling suburbs, with the soothing possibility of the wilds of Georgian Bay once one has withstood the crush of traffic and abandoned the city.

The last story in the collection, The Little Underworld of Edison Wiese, even takes on the underground city of the downtown, in the tunnels where coffee shops serve the huge population of office workers in the towers above ground. As is often the case in Fagan's story, it's the little guy's view of things larger than himself that leads the office building where a guard has fallen asleep at the vast marble desk behind which blink the changing images of the security camera screens.

The stories in My Life Among the Apes are tales of character and incident. Often, a crucial incident in a character's youth – whether romantic, a significant part of his or her education, or among family members – is seen to mark the rest of a character's life. Subtly, Fagan's stories offer the epiphanic conclusion readers may themselves have encountered in James Joyce's early 20th-century story, Araby, in which a boy's yearning and youth is foreclosed on as he understands

'One theme that finds its way out of Fagan's earlier work is of making one's life over by making things, often through music'

Reviewed by Norman Ravvin

the way of things anew.

For Fagan, action is a matter of discovery, toward the flash of recognition upon a story's conclusion. In The Brooklyn Revenge, a widow takes surprising steps toward the woman who betrayed her; while in Wolf, the generation gap between an Old World grandfather and his Frankfurt-based granddaughter closes in an instant.

One theme that finds its way out of Fagan's earlier work and into My Life Among the Apes is that of making things, of making one's life over by making things, often through music. One lost soul risks shaming himself by his decision to perform Leonard Cohen's Bird on the Wire, newly learned, at a raucous suburban bar; in Dreyfus in Wichita, an otherwise ineffective Hebrew school music teacher gets a chance to mount an elaborate musical drama, which has otherwise brought him only failure and disappointment. Lost at Sea, the collection's most lyrical piece, follows a young woman's pursuit of mentorship by a furniture builder on Cape Cod. This story, in which Toronto serves as only a point of departure, offers an evocative portrait of American East Coast life. "So this is how they live down here," the young characters might say to each other, as they move toward a dark conclusion.

Ask a writer today about the state of little magazines, or that of independent publishers, and you will likely hear a long sad story. My Life Among the Apes reconfirms the role of little magazines, as well as that of independent publishers such as Toronto-based Cormorant Books, whose earliest claim to fame was the spectacular success of Nino Ricci's first novel, Lives of the Saints. Much is in the air, especially at our would-be "national" newspaper, regarding the collapse of small-scale Canadian publishing. Don't believe it. Instead, pick up My Life Among the Apes.

Norman Ravvin's most recent books are a novel, The Joyful Child (Gaspereau Press) and Failure's Opposite: Listening to A. M. Klein, co-edited with Sherry Simon (McGill-Queen's).

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Ex-Olympic athlete to swim at 2013 Maccabiah

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When Ami Trauber was a young man preparing to compete for his home country, Israel, things weren't necessarily set up to put him in a position to succeed.

The country had only two 50-metre Olympic-sized swimming pools, one in Haifa, the other in Tel Aviv. They were so busy he had to cut a zigzag course to avoid all the recreational swimmers in the pool.

As if that wasn't difficult enough, because of the weather, the pools were shut down in October, marking an end to his training season. It's doubtful other swim competitors preparing for the 1960 Rome Olympics faced such a limitation.

Then there were the times he and fellow members of the Israeli Olympic team practised in a 15-metre pool at their home training site in Gan Hadassah when the other pools weren't available. What else could they do? There certainly wasn't money to send them abroad to train.

Of course all that took place in the late 1950s, when Israel was a brand new country with not a lot of spare cash to throw around.

A lot has changed since then.

Israel now has more than just two Olympic-sized swimming pools, and Trauber is no longer a svelte teenager swimming at the highest level. Today, he's a svelte 73-year-old who will compete for Canada at next summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Swimming for Canada against Israelis – perhaps including some people he knew back in his salad days – is stirring mixed emotions, he said. Trauber remains an Israeli citizen, but he's eligible to swim for Canada as a Canadian resident.

Given his history, he's managed to wrest a couple of concessions from Maccabi Canada president Tom Bacher. He's been given the green light to wear an Israeli flag pin in his Canadian hat, and "if I win, on the podium I will carry both flags," he said.

As a former Olympian, there's a pretty good chance he will win.

Back in 1960 at the Rome Olympics, he finished 25th in the 100-metre freestyle, breaking Israeli records in doing so. He was runner-up as Israeli athlete of the year in 1959 and 1960 – a period in which he held the national records in the 100-, 200-, 400-, 800-, 1,000- and 1,500-metre freestyle races.

"I was the first swimmer in Israel to break the one-minute mark in the 100-metre freestyle," he said. "In Israel, that was the biggest thing."

After his experience in Rome, he attended university in the United States on an athletic scholarship and continued to train. But when that was over, he gave up the sport cold turkey. He splashed around like anyone else enjoying a swim, but for nearly 50 years, he did not race competitively.

That all changed in August 2009, when he and his wife of 38 years, Marsha, spent a holiday in Rome. She suggested they have a look the old Olympic pool, a visit that stirred Trauber's competitive juices.

A year later, when they were visiting Israel, he reconnected with swimming friends and was invited to swim with his Rome teammates in an exhibition against four Israeli athletes who had competed at the Beijing Olympics.

Trauber surprised himself by winning the Israeli Masters championship in the 50-metre freestyle. It looked like he still had the old magic.

"It triggered something," Trauber said. "Maybe I should go back to swimming."

Back in Canada, he contacted Bacher, who encouraged him to compete for Canada in the masters division at the Maccabiah Games.

He began to put in the work that is necessary to compete at a high level. He began swimming with the North York Gators, a local club. He was in the pool three times a week for an hour or more, plus in the gym twice a week for 3-1/2 hours of dry-land training.

He dropped 24 pounds from his 208-pound frame and felt himself getting stronger and more fit.

Most importantly, he said, he felt he still possessed the mental energy and focus he would need to properly prepare for competition and vie for a medal.

As he got better, it occurred to him he could become one of the top swimmers in his age group in all of Ontario.

He set out to prove it. At a recent swim meet sanctioned by Master Swimming Ontario, Trauber proved to himself and pretty much everyone else that he is a force to be reckoned with on the local swim scene. Competing in the 69-74 age group, he finished first in the 50-metre freestyle, as well as the 100-metre freestyle, the 200-metre freestyle and the 400-metre freestyle.

With those wins under his belt, he's back training for the Ontario Championships, to be held in March in London.

If history is any indication, don't count him out of the medals just yet.

COURAGE IN MOTION: Fifty-eight cyclists from Canada, the United States, Curacao and Australia recently joined 60 disabled Israeli veterans on a five-day tour through the Golan Heights and Jerusalem. Highlights of the trip, dubbed the Courage in Motion bike ride, included cycling alongside Israel's wounded soldiers, visiting an army base and experiencing spectacular sights. Hand cyclist Koby Leon, Israel's silver medalist at the Paralympic Games in London, joined the group for the five days. More than $300,000 was raised for the cycling rehabilitative programs at Beit Halochem centres in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa, Nahariya and Be'er Sheva.

Event planner has no regrets about making aliyah

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Three and a half years ago, Michal Kaye took the plunge. She had been thinking about moving to Israel for a long time, having spent nine years working in an office where she helped people organize an extended trip to Israel.

Finally, she felt the time was right. She had worked for Hillel and the Jewish Community Centre in the United States. She ran birthright trips, participated in conferences and worked in an aliyah centre in Toronto.

"I felt I did everything I could in North America personal-wise," said the 36-year-old event planner in Toronto this month. "If I didn't go at that point, I'd never go. I'd find another excuse next year."

Kaye, who was born in England but grew up in Vancouver and Toronto, arrived in Israel with just a basic foundation of Hebrew, so she enrolled in a course — but she only stuck with it for a month. She had found two jobs: one in a store selling homemade goodies, and another working in administration for a school.

"All I did was work in Hebrew. That was amazing," she said. It forced her to learn the language and the local customs very quickly, and brought her skills to a mostly fluent level. She said she still sometimes has trouble speaking the language, but she can almost completely understand Hebrew now.

A job at a company focused on high-tech "taught me everything I needed to know [about] Israeli society," she said. For example, she said that, unlike her experiences in North America, she was able to speak candidly with her boss.

"There's an authority figure, but... everyone talks to everyone," she said.

Kaye moved to Jerusalem. She said she ended up there because it has a young, single Orthodox community. As an Orthodox woman, she said, she was not attracted to the lifestyle in Tel Aviv, which reminded her of her time living in New York City. She felt that Jerusalem was the right home for her.

Finding herself unsatisfied working for other people, she decided to start her own business in event planning, having learned many tricks of the trade from her mother, Suzanne, who is a florist and event planner.

"It's a billion-dollar industry in Israel," she said. "There's so much going on."

Her business in Israel faces different challenges than it would in North America. For example, she said the flower choices are highly dependent on the season. In Canada, she could plan to have the same arrangement all year round, but in Israel, she had to adapt to the season.

Additionally, she said Israeli businesses tend to have a more laid-back atmosphere compared to those in North America. It can even seem disorganized on occasion.

"Sometimes the whole wedding is last minute," she said. "You could plan a wedding in two weeks and it could be beautiful."

Most of her clients are from Canada, the United States and Australia, though she works with people from all over the world who are hoping to hold an event such as a wedding or bar mitzvah in Israel.

Given the distance between Kaye and her clients, technology is a godsend, she said. For example, she is currently planning a wedding for a man in Australia and a woman in Serbia.

"I'll have communication with him in the morning, then she'll wake up two or three hours later and she'll email me," she said. "It's like he's going to sleep and she's waking up."

The time zone differences mean Kaye's work is not a typical nine-to-five job. Some days she wakes up early and other days she works late to co-ordinate the times.

Kaye's father is Zac Kaye, executive director for Hillel of Greater Toronto, who has been involved in Jewish student leadership around the world since before she was born. She said being surrounded by his work gave her the skill to relate to and work with every kind of person.

Given that she has worked with Jewish communities outside of Israel, it was an easy transition for her. "Now I just work in a different Jewish community with seven million people," she said.

Her 20-year-old sister, Chaya Kaye, moved to Israel a year after she did. They spent the first year together and shared a home, before Chaya found a place to live in the city of Giv'at Shmuel.

"She's my assistant when I need it," Michal Kaye said. "We're there, we're sisters, we help each other out."

Kaye is currently visiting her family in Toronto, but said she has felt scared for her friends and sister still in Israel during the most recent outbreak of violence. She has opened up her apartment to her sister, and said that if she were not in Canada, she would have opened her door to offer refuge to people from Ashkelon.

This kind of situation has become part of her everyday life, so she doesn't stress or worry about it. It's all part of living in a country surrounded by unfriendly neighbours, she said.

"The benefits outweigh the negatives," she said, adding that she generally feels safe in Jerusalem.

Anybody thinking of moving to Israel should do lots of research — but not so much that it overwhelms you, Kaye advised.

"Come with an open mind and no predetermined ideas of anything," she said. "It's not an easy place to live, but when you're there and everything's working, just like in everyday life, then it just makes sense."

And Kaye, having found her place in Israeli society, said she has no regrets about her move.

"It's the best thing I ever did," she said.

Misery loves company

Dear Ella,

My workplace has become a very depressing place to go every day. From the moment I walk in to the moment I leave, I am constantly bombarded with stories about illnesses, bodily functions and miracle cures.

If it's not the employees, it's the clients who feed off the conversations the employees start. The biggest topics of the month were the cold that never left, the thyroid demon and let's not forget the biggest culprit of all - gluten intolerance.

I'm at the end of my rope! I feel like standing on a table and screaming "Shut up!" Doesn't anybody discuss movies or travel, or even politics and religion, anymore?

It's not like I work at a medical facility, so this topic should not be front and centre. I, too, have had my share of health issues, but I don't have the need to run every drug or treatment by everyone who will listen.

Believe it or not, I love my job and I care about these people, but I get sucked into this warped world of hypochondria, which makes me feel awful by the end of the day.

Is there anything I can say to politely get the point across that this is not normal?

Sick of the Sickies

Dear Sick of the Sickies,

The constant bombardment of health issues can be overwhelming, but it's not uncommon especially at this time of year - cold and flu season. Working in an environment where the discussions are constantly negative can affect your own mood, by actually leading you to feel the effects physically.

It's natural that when people are feeling off, they need reassurance, as well as a little sympathy, and perhaps empathy. For instance, when a client first arrives, chances are they will greet you by asking, "How are you?" That leaves the door wide open for the toxic conversation to begin.

You've heard the saying "Misery loves company," right? You may not be the type that likes to share, but some people like to "compare notes," and they take comfort in knowing they're not alone in their health challenges. Even if they're not sick, most people feel good about supporting someone who is. Others, like yourself, prefer to be private about personal health matters.

When you work in an environment with people, you must be tolerant of many different personalities. Often you spend more time with your colleagues than with your own family. Chances are you're not going to change your colleagues, but what you can do is try to change the subject. Health is universal, and anyone can identify with the topic. That's why people talk about it.

Before anyone has a chance, steer the conversation to something that others can relate to. There are lots of interesting subjects to discuss, such as news events, family, vacations, sports, hobbies etc. As long as your conversation is enticing and the topic broad enough, others can identify with it and join in.

This is not going away. You need to change the way you internalize these conversations. Either join in, change the subject or find a way to access your happy place.

Being the 'it' in care isn't easy

An 84-year-old woman and her daughter, her primary caregiver, were in my office.

"I feel a lot better since that visit to the emergency room in the summer when they changed my medications. I haven't had any more dizzy spells or falls," the mother said.

The daughter concurred, and I confirmed from the discharge summary of the finding following a fall that she had blood-pressure levels that fell when she stood up and her heartbeat also slowed down. The symptoms were thought to be the result of a combination of medications she was taking for high-blood pressure, which were producing an excessive effect, leading to "postural hypotension."

I was told that since the fall the mother was living in her daughter's home. The mother's apartment had suffered some water damage during a rainstorm and required repairs, but it was not yet certain if she would feel secure enough to return and live on her own, even though that was what she appeared to prefer.

Historical and testing evidence indicated that the mother suffered from mild cognitive impairment, but for most of her function and normal basic activities, she was able to care for herself. The mother repeated herself a bit, but this alone did not appear to interfere greatly with her function. She expressed herself quite clearly and understood what was happening to her.

Senior Side of Life

After I asked about the mother's current living situation and plans for the future, part of my normal assessment of patients and their living situations and support systems, the daughter asked, "Do you think my mother should move into a retirement home rather than living with me, because during the day she is alone in the house, but we have checked it all for safety and she has an emergency call system that she knows how to use?"

I looked at the patient and asked her how she felt about living in her daughter's house, and other than musing that returning to her own home would be her preference, she said she felt comfortable living with her daughter, who had arranged the house so that she could do everything she wanted to do and be comfortable on the modified ground floor.

The daughter continued, "My sister who lives in Toronto and my brother who lives in New York feel she should be in a retirement home for safety reasons and are urging admission. She tried one that seemed very nice and suitable, but after three days she called and begged to be taken back to my house. They are now looking at others, but Mom says she really does not want to go into one."

The patient looked at me and said, "I do not want to live in one of those places. It is either back at my own home or with my daughter."

I explained to both the principles by which such living decisions should be made and what seemed to be the ability of the mother to participate in such decisions. "I think you all need a good discussion with someone who understands the process of personal decisions and how alternative housing arrangements should be made."

Arrangements were made for a family meeting with a social worker. The mother seemed very pleased that her wishes were being listened to and respected - that step and process is key to any such discussions. Being the "it" in the middle of family discord is not always easy.

Canada votes against PA statehood bid

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canada strongly objected last week to the motion by the United Nations General Assembly to upgrade "Palestine" to non-member observer state status.

The vote ultimately passed Nov. 29 by a margin of 138 to nine, with 41 abstentions.

Other countries that voted against the bid were the United States, Israel, the Czech Republic, Marshall Islands, Micronesia, Nauru, Palau and Panama.

The Palestinians had been expected to handily win the vote, which is largely symbolic.

In a speech to the assembly immediately prior to the vote, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird called the UN's determination to hold the vote an "utterly regrettable decision to abandon policy and principle" and said Canada would explore other options to help with the peace process.

"This resolution will not advance the cause of peace or spur a return to negotiations. Will the Palestinian people be better off as a result? No. On the contrary, this unilateral step will harden positions and raise unrealistic expectations while doing nothing to improve the lives of the Palestinian people," he said.

"Canada is committed to a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East whereby two states live side-by-side in peace and security. Any two-state solution must be negotiated and mutually agreed upon by both sides. Any unilateral action, from either side, outside of the bilateral framework outlined above, is ultimately unhelpful."

A day after the vote, Canada recalled its diplomats from missions in the West Bank and Israel in order to "temporarily assess the implications of [the] UN General Assembly vote and inform Canada's response to it," Baird said in a statement.

Canada is also reconsidering its five-year, $300-million aid commitment to the Palestinian Authority (PA).

In a media scrum on Parliament Hill on Nov. 28, NDP Opposition leader Thomas Mulcair called the Palestinian request to be upgraded to non-member state status a "reasonable demand" and criticized the Conservative government for using intimidation tactics against the Palestinian Authority.

He said the NDP position on Middle East peace calls for a two-state solution, with each state existing inside secure borders based on direct negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

Alanis stops by the Wall

Award-winning Canadian singer-songwriter Alanis Morissette visited the Western Wall on Sunday during a concert tour of Israel. Morissette resisted calls to cancel her Dec. 3 concert in Tel Aviv. She is seen here in the company of an unidentified friend, left, who accompanied the singer to the Kotel.

Goalie Suspended

EDMONTON — An 11-year-old Edmonton-area pee-wee hockey goalie was suspended for calling a Jewish teammate a "f---ing Jew" and saying the mother of a biracial teammate "should go back to Africa where she belongs." The goalie also told him that Nazis had killed Jews and threatened to kill the boy if he didn't stay away from him. Both boys' parents complained to the St. Albert Minor Hockey Association, which suspended the goalie and launched an investigation into both incidents, the St. Albert Gazette reported.

Peace Now Backs Bid

WASHINGTON — Americans for Peace Now urged U.S. President Barack Obama to back the Palestinians' bid to upgrade their status at the United Nations to non-member observer state, saying it would "restore faith in a negotiated two-state solution." The Nov. 27 statement by the left-wing group placed it at odds with other Jewish groups. It was issued two days ahead of a vote in the UN General Assembly on the Palestinians' latest application for enhanced status. Some leading U.S. lawmakers had threatened to cut assistance to the Palestinians if they pressed ahead with the bid. I Street, another left-wing pro-Israel group, didn't take a stand on the bid but pledged to oppose efforts to penalize the Palestinians for it.

Lawyer Seeks Ouster

PARIS — A lawyer in Lyon, France, asked a court to disqualify a judge because he's Jewish. Alexis Dubruel asked the court to remove Albert Levy from the bench in a case involving her client and her client's ex-son-in-law named Moises, which is French for Moses. Dubruel based her petition, which has yet to be answered, on a part of the French penal code stating that a judge will be disqualified if "circumstances strong enough exist to suspect the judge's impartiality." The circumstances are paternal and familial, she said. "The judge

Centre Sued For Claiming To Cure Gays

NEW YORK — A Jewish centre in New Jersey that offers therapy to reverse homosexuality is being sued for allegedly making fraudulent claims.

Four gay men and two of the mothers filed the suit Nov. 27 in New Jersey against Jews Offering New Alternatives to Homosexuality (JONAH), which offers treatments the group says can turn clients straight. Some include using rabbinic writings on the subject of homosexuality.

The lawsuit, filed through the Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), maintains the centre uses misleading pretences to entice clients to enrol in its program. The plaintiffs are previous JONAH clients.

"Despite the consensus of mainstream professional organizations that conversion therapy doesn't work, this racket continues to scam vulnerable gay men and lesbians out of thousands of dollars and inflicts significant harm on them," said Christine Sun of the SPLC.

JONAH founder Arthur Goldberg and counsellor Alan Downing violate state fraud laws, the suit said, and JONAH therapy costs a minimum of $100 for weekly individual counselling and $60 for group sessions.

The suit said the therapy, which was rejected by mainstream psychiatry "four decades ago," put them at risk of "depression, anxiety and self-destructive behaviour" but gave them no benefit.

In response, Goldberg told ABC News that many JONAH clients were successful and healed, and "hundreds of the clients we serve are satisfied."

Arthur Goldberg

and my client have a paternal connection evident in their names. The judge in question is named Levy, the 'papa' of the person name Moises," she wrote, referring to the biblical Moses being from the tribe of Levi. Her client is a woman seeking visiting rights with her grandchildren. Members of the French bar association were reportedly considering asking the bar for disciplinary action against Dubruel.

Steeles' Memorial Chapel

For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.

Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.

If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.

It's amazing how a little love and caring can make such a big difference.

American Idol judge wants bat mitzvah in Israel

Paula Abdul speaks with her rabbi in Toronto

Susan Minuk

Special to The CJN

Singer and choreographer Paula Abdul, who's currently best known for her stint as a judge on the TV show American Idol, says she hopes to have a bat mitzvah in Israel someday.

"I attended a Conservative temple in the Los Angeles area and celebrated the holidays - Yom Kippur, Chanukah and Passover. I didn't have a bat mitzvah but still hope to in Israel," Abdul told about 450 people at the Eglinton Grand in Toronto recently.

More than $100,000 was contributed at the Nov. 25 fundraiser. The money is going toward paying for property Chabad on the Avenue purchased on Falkirk Avenue in the Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue neighbourhood. Chabad on the Avenue operates the Family Shul.

Abdul spoke about her Jewish roots in an onstage conversation moderated by Rabbi Chaim Mentz of Chabad of Belair in California.

"I have known Rabbi Mentz almost half my life. We met in 1988 on the last night of Chanukah. It was pouring rain. I was with my soon-to-be-husband, Emilio Estevez. In the pouring rain, Rabbi Mentz captured my heart. I recall telling him I was leaving early the next morning for a tour. He asked me if I had a mezuzah. I replied that I did not, but when I came home from my tour, there were well over a dozen mezuzahs waiting for me," Abdul said, laughing.

"I think that being Jewish, having that sense of community, and growing up as a Jewish girl is one thing, but what truly changed me is having a relationship with my rabbi. Feeling safe, feeling like you belong, feeling like there is never a time I can't talk to him. There is no judgment at Chabad," she said.

Abdul was born in San Fernando, Calif., in 1962, to Jewish parents. Her father, Harry Abdul, was born in Aleppo, Syria, and raised in Brazil, and subsequently immigrated to the United States.

Paula's mother, Lorraine Rykiss, who is originally from Saint Boniface, Man., has ancestors from Russia and Ukraine. Abdul said her mother spoke Yiddish in the house.

Early on in their formal legal education, students of Anglo-American jurisprudence learn about the rules of equity. The rules of equity were developed by English judges in the Court of Chancery as an application of conscience to abate the sting, so to speak, of the strict application of the punctilious and exacting letter of the common law. Over time, the rules of equity increasingly infused the common law and the two "systems" melded. In theory at least, conscience would always "soften" the strict application of precedent.

Two of the most compellingly obvious rules are:

- "One who seeks equity must do equity." An individual ought not demand a specific benefit from someone if he is unwilling to provide that same benefit in the same circumstances.

- "One who comes to the court of equity must come with clean hands." In other words, one cannot profit from his own wrongdoing in the very matter in which he seeks redress.

The rules are statements of essential fairness and justice. They make eminent sense to us. They accord with the most basic, fundamental values that underpin our society. Without them, we would consider our society unjust. And indeed, it would be.

Thus, we shake our heads and perhaps even clench our fists – no longer in disbelief, but rather in combined rising disgust and overwhelming sadness – when we hear the specific pleadings of Mahmoud Abbas at the United Nations General Assembly.

No leadership more than the Palestinians', so constantly, so ceaselessly, so cynically ignores the rules of equity, what we know and believe to be the fundamental pinions of honesty, truth and fairness in public life.

It would be an irony were it not a grotesque hypocrisy, that Abbas couched his remarks to the assembly

editor's desk...

in legal terminology using language of human rights and principles of justice.

To cite but one example from the many, on four occasions, Abbas explicitly referred to the original UN partition vote on Nov. 29, 1947, and to the "nakba" (catastrophe, referring to the declaration of the State of Israel), "the unprecedented historical injustice inflicted on the Palestinian people," as he defined it.

At one point in his remarks, he insidiously appropriated the images of the Shoah. It long ago became an entrenched tactic used by Palestinian leaders to do this. They aggressively, insistently, but falsely paint a portrait of themselves to the world as victims of a perfidy by the Jewish People. The reference is as abhorrent as it is entirely untrue.

"The Palestinian people, who miraculously recovered from the ashes of al-nakba of 1948, which was intended to extinguish their being and to expel them in order to uproot and erase their presence... in one of the most dreadful campaigns of ethnic cleansing and dispossession in modern history."

Certain facts are incontrovertible. Truth is not merely a matter of different interpretations of different facts of history. Yet, Abbas hides the truth. He distorts it. He disdains it. He tries to kill it.

Abbas did not say that the nakba was brought upon the Palestinians by their own leaders, especially by men like Mufti Haj Amin al-Husseini and his confederates. It was they who refused to accept the partition decision of the UN General Assembly. They immediately declared war upon the Jewish Yishuv (pre-state settlement of Eretz Yisrael). They declared the slaughter of Jewish men, women and children a holy obligation. They called for the Jews to be thrown into the sea.

But the Jews were unwilling to be slaughtered.

They fought back. They pushed back. They defended. And in some places, too, they expelled, rather than be expelled. But foremost, the Jews declared: "We shall not die, but live." And so the Jews prevailed – much to the mufti's surprise, chagrin and rage.

The mufti's legacy to his people, ever since, has been permanent rage and a self-image that has left them disabled, that does not allow any image other than that of victims. But if they are victims, they are the victims of their own leaders.

"We affirm that Palestine will always adhere to and respect... international humanitarian law, uphold equality, guarantee civil liberties, uphold the rule of law, promote democracy and pluralism and uphold and protect the rights of women," Abbas said to the General Assembly.

But his lofty words were a lie even as he spoke them. As many scholars pointed out last week, member of Parliament Irwin Cotler among them, Abbas' very petition to the General Assembly violated a solemn agreement Palestinian leaders had signed with Israel nearly 20 years ago. The rule of law?

Nor do we believe that pluralism really means that much to Abbas since he has already vowed that Israeli Jews will not be allowed to live in his Palestine. Palestine will be Judenrein.

Abbas came to court recalling Yasser Arafat. He was also echoing the messages of Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh and standing in the shoes of Haj Amin al-Husseini, seeking equity for his people but without the clean hands demanded by the rules of equity. Alas, the world seems not to care.

But today, as then, Jews fight back.

Debaters clash over nuclear-armed Iran

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Can a nuclear-armed Iran be tolerated?

That was the incisive and troubling question that four high-powered speakers addressed last week as they argued for and against the motion at the Munk Debates, held at Roy Thomson Hall before an audience of about 3,000.

Amos Yadlin

Opposing the resolution were Amos Yadlin, the former head of Israeli military intelligence, and Charles Krauthammer, a Washington Post syndicated columnist.

Arguing for the motion were Fareed Zakaria, a CNN global affairs commentator, and Vali Nasr, dean of Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies.

Yadlin, one of eight F-16 pilots who obliterated Iraq's nuclear reactor more than 30 years ago, said that Iran can't be trusted with a nuclear arsenal because its leaders continually call for Israel's destruction and deny the Holocaust.

Calling the Iranian regime "cruel and radical," as well as the world's chief sponsor of state terrorism, he declared, "Current Iranian threats [against Israel] should be taken very seriously."

Suggesting that Iran may pass on atomic devices or nuclear technology to terrorists and that a nuclear-armed Iran could touch off a nuclear arms race in the Middle East, Yadlin said Iran's nuclear program should be treated as an international rather than as an Israeli problem.

Claiming that Cold War-era deterrence will not work in Iran's case, he said Iran is not a rational player in western terms and seeks domination of the region.

"This debate is not about attacking Iran, but preventing Iran from acquiring a nuclear bomb. We don't call for wars. We ask the world to wake up and stop Iran. Iran wants to destroy Israel, and we have to take threat this very seriously."

Yadlin recommended that economic sanctions on Iran already in place should be tightened so that it is further isolated.

Zakaria, host of the program Fareed Zakaria GPS, said he truly understands Yadlin's fears and concerns.

But asserting that Iran can in fact be contained and deterred, as the former Soviet Union was in the Cold War period, he said that a military strike aimed at destroying Iran's nuclear sites would be disastrous and would rally Iranian public opinion around the Islamic regime.

Besides, he noted, a bombing campaign would set back Iran by only two to three years.

Iran, despite its theological and ideological underpinnings, can be deterred because it's cool and calculated in its actions, he observed.

Neither Israel nor the United States have drawn "red lines," the point past which a war with Iran would be touched off, Zakaria remarked.

"You want to keep the other guy guessing," he said, adding that Israel and the United States continue to hew to a policy of ambiguity with respect to Iran.

Krauthammer, who also appears on TV as a Fox News contributor, argued that if Tehran is successful in acquiring a nuclear arsenal, Iran would become a hegemon in the Mideast, thereby encouraging Arab states to build their own nuclear programs.

This development would undermine the concept of nuclear non-proliferation, he noted.

Branding Iran the greatest and most aggressive exporter of terrorism, he said, "This is a regime that has threatened to annihilate Israel."

Iran is a highly ideologically driven regime, and high up on its must-do list is Israel's destruction, he added. He cited a comment by a former Iranian president in which he boasted that Iran, but not Israel, could absorb a nuclear attack.

Fareed Zakaria

Courage, principle, Canada

Canadian Press reported last weekend that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had telephoned Prime Minister Stephen Harper to thank Canada "for its friendship and principled position" in voting against the resolution at the United Nations General Assembly conferring non-member, observer-state status for Palestine.

Netanyahu might have also thanked Canada for showing courage. Not only did Canada stand against the thudding stampede of the 138-strong herd of General Assembly members, but it also refused to back down in the face of a threat by the PLO that there would be "consequences" for voting against the Palestinians' UN ploy.

In explaining Canada's reasons for refusing to endorse the Palestinian initiative, Foreign Minister John Baird was quite explicit. Indeed he set out the reason in the very first sentence of his remarks: "Canada opposes this resolution in the strongest terms because it undermines the core foundations of a decades-long commitment by the international community and the parties themselves to a two-state solution, arrived at through direct negotiations" (our emphasis).

The rest of Baird's remarks were a recap of the history of the UN's and other international parties' involvement in trying to bring the Palestinians and the Israelis to a peace agreement from 1947 to 2008.

"Successive UN Security Council resolutions and various international commitments and understandings over nearly seven decades have formed the building blocks of a collaborative peace process that remains unfinished. The path to peace has historically rested in direct negotiations between the two parties to resolve all outstanding issues and it remains the same today. Solutions can only come through the two sides working together" (our emphasis).

But Baird was not the only Canadian last week to resist implied or more direct threats of the misinformed or malevolently anti-Israel supporters of the Palestinians.

As reported by the London Jewish Chronicle, award-winning singer-songwriter and Ottawa native Alanis Morissette was bullied by advocates of a boycott of Israel who urged her to cancel her Dec. 3 concert in Tel Aviv.

The Palestinian Campaign for the Academic and Cultural Boycott of Israel spearheaded the campaign against her.

"We would find it especially disturbing should you choose to play in Israel given its recent onslaught on Gaza. Palestinian civil society groups are calling on artists to shun Tel Aviv in the same way that South African activists called on artists to boycott Sun City," the boycott campaigners wrote to Morissette.

Just as Baird had the courage to publicly resist supporting the PLO's deceitful ploy at the UN, Morissette also chose to act with singular preference to principle and courage on behalf of individual artistic freedom and historic honesty. In the process, they both strived in a true manner to bring about peace between Palestinians and Israelis.

Barbara Stern, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' national committee for Soviet Jewry, reported that Jewish emigration from the USSR for 1987 would reach 8,000, a six-year high and up from 914 for all of 1986. In 1981, 9,447 Jews — down 127 per cent from the previous year's total of 21,471 — were allowed to emigrate.

Premier's Chanukah greetings

On behalf of the government of Ontario, I am delighted to extend warm greetings to the Jewish community on the occasion of Chanukah. In Ontario, we derive our strength and unique character from the cultural and spiritual diversity that defines our great province. The Jewish community is a vital part of that cherished diversity and has made, and continues to make, invaluable contributions to the social, cultural and economic life of our province.

Chanukah is a festival that constantly inspires as it tells a timeless story of how courage and conviction have the power to overcome adversity. It is also an affirmation of remaining true to one's beliefs and a celebration of the inherent rights and dignity of every human being.

As you gather with family and friends to mark the Festival of Lights, may the glow of the illuminated menorah fill your hearts and homes with a special joy. Please accept my very best wishes for a happy and memorable Chanukah.

Open letter of gratitude

Without a doubt, Operation Pillar of Defence would have looked very different had Iron Dome not been operational. The system intercepted hundreds of rockets that were headed straight into residential areas. Iron Dome saved lives, protected property and gave people a sense of security, something that they had been missing for more than a decade. Iron Dome was the product of the hard work of dedicated and talented people. When I came to work three weeks ago, some friends of mine were running out of the building. It telling me they were "off to set up a battery in Tel Aviv." Turns out that they worked for 48 hours straight, into Shabbat, not pausing to change their clothing, shower, or even to eat, but they set up that battery. And three hours later, that battery shot down a Fajr-5 headed straight for Tel Aviv.

Since 2010, the people of the United States have given the State of Israel nearly $300 million for the procurement of Iron Dome. Another $600 million has been allocated. The Iron Dome batteries that were funded with American money played a critical part in the conflict. Your money, your help, saved lives. There are people walking around today who are eating falafel, learning Torah, or playing with their children, who would not be here today if it were not for the United States. To this end, no words will ever suffice. But let me try: thank you.

Criticizes Hamas-Israeli ceasefire

Lihyot 'am chofshi be'artzeinu, "to be a people free in our land." Never has this statement from Harikvah been proven more false than in the most recent conflict and "ceasefire" between Israel and Hamas. Israel's policies, including kowtowing to world pressure, have ensured that for the foreseeable future, Tel Avivians and Jerusalemites will experience their own personal Sderots. Instead of destroying the 400 tunnels Hamas built to smuggle weapons and continuing to target Hamas' terrorist leaders, Israel did the opposite. It destroyed only 150 tunnels before agreeing to the ceasefire, it agreed to allow the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt to arbitrate on any transgressions with respect thereto, and it agreed to halt the targeted assassinations that ravaged Hamas' high command.

As can be witnessed in Gaza, Lebanon and Sinai, Israel's policy of withdrawal has proven to be a folly of its own creation. Judea and Samaria remains quiet as a direct result of the Israel Defence Forces military presence. Given that world reaction to Israel's military operations elicit identical responses regardless of severity, Israel should have continued until its objectives were realized. Israel needs a permanent military presence in both Gaza and Sinai, and I believe that such a presence will inevitably reoccur, but only after too many rockets have fallen on defenceless Israeli civilians. There has never been an Arab problem, only a Jewish problem in that Israel allows itself to remain a de facto-controlled entity by allowing the strategic interests of foreign states to govern its own.

Yiddish and Hebrew in Canada: the latest word

Examining the data from the 2011 census

Leo Davids
Special to The CJN

Although we can't readily measure the vitality of Jewish culture in Canada, the census does enable us to follow the language scene for Yiddish and Hebrew. Results from the 2011 census were released by Statistics Canada on Oct. 24. These are the most recent numbers regarding mother tongue (one's first childhood language) and home language (the tongue most commonly spoken in each respondent's home). We await other data in May or June 2013, such as the number of Canadians who declare their religious denomination as "Jewish."

The time series that can take us back historically to the pre-Holocaust years is Yiddish mother tongue. Although mother tongue does not mean that the respondent still uses that particular language today, it at least indicates knowledge of, or ability in, that language. The significance of home language is basically that today's home language is the next generation's mother tongue. In other words, home language data provide a possibility of forecasting future numbers of speakers.

Yiddish Today

Yiddish is that quite unofficial, folksy mixture of medieval Hebrew and German, with bits and pieces from Polish, Russian and other languages that Jews spoke where they lived in previous centuries. It has no homeland and no government protection anywhere. However, it was the "internal" language for Ashkenazi Jews, developing historically as they moved from Italy through France into German-speaking areas, eventually concentrating in large numbers in Poland and nearby areas. It was lovingly referred to as the mamaloshen. The Holocaust destroyed millions of Yiddish speakers, but many Jews had already left Europe before World War II and brought Yiddish with them.

Canadian Jews were overwhelmingly Yiddish speakers until the mid-1900s, with the 1931 Canadian census informing us that there were 150,000 people of Yiddish mother tongue (YMT) across the country. Over time, however, that number has been shrinking – fast. In 2011, the national total for Yiddish mother tongue was 15,200 people, about one-tenth of the count in 1931.

Yiddish is surviving in today's world thanks to one important group of Jews: haredim, also called ultra-orthodox. Especially among chassidic Jews, Yiddish is the preferred language to bequeath to one's children by consistently speaking it at home. For Canada, that population is only found nowadays in greater Toronto and – most prominently – in greater Montreal. Our table shows the numbers for all of Canada, as well as for Montreal and Toronto, and that enthusiastic centre of yiddishkeit (when we remember the mid-1900s), Winnipeg. What do these numbers tell us?

Back in 1951, there were still more than 100,000 Canadians of Yiddish mother tongue. Montreal had 41 per cent of all YMT respondents in 1951, Toronto had 27 per cent and Winnipeg had 10 per cent. The rest of Canada had about one-fifth of the YMT population then.

By 1991, the national count for Yiddish mother tongue had declined by about 80 per cent, and the total was only 21,400. The percentage division between the three major Jewish cities had shifted somewhat, as Toronto had 40 per cent of the YMT count in 1991, Montreal had holding the use of the mamaloshen.

The table also reports on Yiddish home language, which will be reported as mother tongue in the future by those who are now children. Whereas Toronto only reports about 500 people using Yiddish as their main tongue in the home, the Montreal count is more than 6,000. That Montreal number (6,150) is fully 89 per cent of all Canadians reporting Yiddish to be their home language. Clearly, Canadian Yiddish has a future only in the greater Montreal area, as one could already see from census numbers during the 1990s.

One further wrinkle on this is to look at the age of YMT Canadians. Checking the counts for Yiddish speakers below age 15, we find a great contrast between Toronto and Montreal. Whereas only five per cent of Toronto Yiddish mother tongue speakers are children under 15, in Montreal, 40 per cent of Yiddish mother tongue speakers are in that age category. All across Canada, YMT is now usually found just among Jew-are basically the same language throughout and are also a single category on the Canadian census.

One might think that Canadian language-use numbers for Yiddish and Hebrew would be similar, but that is not at all the case.

In the decade from 1991 to 2001, there was a small increase in the national Hebrew mother tongue (HMT) counts, but – no doubt due to larger immigration from Israel – the HMT total rose close to 50 per cent between 2001 and 2011. Unlike the Yiddish situation, greater Toronto is the main "home" for Canada's HMT residents. As of 2011, Montreal had 21 per cent of HMT Canadians, while Toronto had 57 per cent. That leaves 22 per cent for the rest of Canada. There are former Israelis in a number of Canada's major cities. Vancouver, our third-largest Jewish community in recent decades (replacing Winnipeg) has 1,540 HMT residents.

As for child speakers, some 18 per cent of HMT Canadians are below age 15, and the same holds true for Toronto.

Looking at Hebrew home language, our 2011 figures show 8,400 HHL Canadians, the bulk being in Greater Toronto (58 per cent of the national total). However, some families do speak Hebrew regularly at home outside of Montreal and Toronto. Vancouver has 725 HHL residents and Calgary has more than 200.

Conclusions

Remember that Yiddish is almost always learned at home from parents or grandparents, although a few people acquire Yiddish in school. In great contrast, Hebrew is mostly spoken by Canadians due to Jewish schooling or through spending time in contemporary Israel. The Hebrew mother tongue count on the Canadian census shows Israeli-origin speakers living in Canada, but does not describe the entire Hebrew-speaking population here. Tens of thousands of Jewish children and youth participate in formal Jewish education, which always teaches Hebrew, and often in Hebrew. Yiddish, however, is rare in Jewish schools other than haredi/chassidic ones.

The census data clearly show a viable Yiddish-speaking population only in the Montreal area. There are still a few thousand Yiddish-speaking children there. Elsewhere, there is no "life" for the Yiddish tongue in Canada. On the other hand, Hebrew has tens of thousands of speakers in greater Toronto, but it also maintains a visible presence in other large Canadian centres. Jewish schools both produce non-HMT Hebrew speakers and attract teachers from Israel who speak Hebrew in their Canadian homes.

b) Yiddish Home Language in 2011 – All Canada and Montreal vs. Toronto
Total	Montreal	Toronto
6,875	6,150 89%	500 7%

slightly increased its percentage, and Winnipeg still had 7.6 per cent of Canada's total.

Looking at the newest figures, in 2011, we find that the YMT total has shrunk further to 15,200. Of these, fully 59 per cent live in greater Montreal, while Toronto has only 30 per cent. Winnipeg now has less than 500 Yiddish mother tongue Jews, constituting three per cent of the national total.

Only in Montreal was the YMT loss between 1991 and 2011 fairly moderate. For all other major communities, the YMT shrinkage in those 20 years was quite dramatic. Our explanation for the difference between Montreal and the rest of Jewish Canada is that only in Montreal do we find substantial, strong haredi/chassidic sub-communities who are strongly upholding the use of the mamaloshen.

Looking at the Yiddish home language age breakdown in Montreal, there were 3,340 children whose main home language was Yiddish in 2011, making up 54 per cent of all Yiddish home language Montrealers that year! This can only be explained by a small but significant number of haredi homes speaking Yiddish regularly with their numerous children. The high fertility in this Jewish population sector is a well-known fact.

Hebrew Today

Hebrew is both the ancient language of the Jewish people and the national vernacular of today's Israel. Although there are some differences between biblical, rabbinic and modern Hebrew, they

What Chanukah teaches us about Jewish history

Ah, the smell of frying latkes clinging to our clothes, the temptation to eat one more sufganiyah. Nothing says Chanukah like food. However, there is also a holiday attached to this feast, one that has interesting questions attached to it. Here are two, plus a minhag.

First question: in all the texts on this celebration, where are the Maccabees?

We pride ourselves on being a people bound by our history. We should turn then to the historical, rather than the aggadic. As Yosef Yerushalmi has written in his book Zakhor: Jewish History and Jewish Memory, "It was ancient Israel that first assigned a decisive significance to history and thus forged a new world view whose essential premises were eventually appropriated by Christianity and Islam."

If we accept this, then we must also accept that we do not merely mythologize our history, but acknowledge both the good and the bad. So it should be with Chanukah.

So, when we recite, "In the days of Matriyah, son of Yochanan the High Priest," we throw history out the window. The Maccabees – later the Hasmonean dynasty – were not high priests and indeed had risen up not just in opposition to the Greeks but also to the Hellenizing Jewish elite of the country, including the High Priest Menelaus. The rabbis of the Mishnah were

Jean M. Gerber

at pains to write those Hasmonians out of history, since, once in power, they took over not just the high priesthood, to which they were not entitled, but also the kingship, reserved for descendants of the Davidic line, which they were not.

As the Hasmonians became Hellenized, the Pharisees and the later rabbis did all they could to downplay their military victories and re-imagine Chanukah as the result of the miracles done for Israel by God. Hence the candles represent eight days of miraculous light in the rededicated temple until new, consecrated oil could be prepared.

Second question: where are the women in the story? Here I cite Rivy Poupko Kletenik, whose class on the topic "Judith the Obscure" I recently attended. I am using her translations and her conclusions. Any errors are mine.

Who lights the Chanukah candles? The Talmud Shabbat 23a, mandates: "A woman definitely lights, as Rabbi Yehoshua ben Levi says, women are obligated in the Chanukah candles, for they, too, were in that miracle." Rabbi Yehoshua's opinion is repeated in Talmud Megilla 4a.

The Rashbam in the Tosefot explains that "the critical part of the miracle was done through [the women's] hands, in Purim through Esther, in Chanukah by Yehudit."

According to Rivy Kletenik's analysis, the apocryphal story of Judith migrated in the Middle Ages into the miracle of Chanukah, based on the phrase "they too were in/included in the miracle." In the story, Judith goes to the camp of a besieging army led by General Holofernes. She induces a drunken slumber in him and beheads him. She returns to the besieged city and announces her deed, which then is proclaimed to the now leaderless army. They flee, and the Israelites are saved!

Thus did a Jewish historical novel (perhaps the first) migrate into Chanukah.

That inclusion of a woman in the miracle of Chanukah, long stretch or not, is a delightful new learning for me.

Finally, a minhag. The commentators gave women another gift: it became custom for women to refrain from work while the candles were burning. (Note to self: get longer-lasting candles.) That is a custom I will be incorporating into our celebrations from this point on.

As we enjoy both our customs and our history, this is a welcome holiday, coming as it does at the darkest time of the year, filling our homes with light, joy and gladness – and presents for the kids.

The personal really is political

How do we understand major or even minor events that take place in the world? We read about them and listen to learned (or not-so-learned) explanations that place them in context and enable some comprehension, and even appreciation. But full understanding requires a moment of identification with the subject that comes from a personal connection.

Decades ago, one of the critical claims of the feminist movement was that the personal is political. This phrase was an indicator of a strongly held belief that the very personal was to be seen as reflected in the public or political arena. Thus, a man beating his wife was to be viewed as not simply a private domestic scene, but a societal problem that required legislative and criminal attention.

In the 21st century, we're learning to look for the other side of the phrase. Those large-scale pictures of public events can only become meaningful to us when we understand the individual experiences involved or personal tolls they exact. This has become increasingly necessary as we're inundated with facts and figures in our global "village." As the world seems so close or closed in, we can know about events all over the world, but we don't really recognize the people and places. How will we understand these events and experiences?

Recently, we all heard of the terrible suffering of some New Yorkers during super storm Sandy. Many tried to help in various ways, but the vagaries of the storm only had an impact on us as we heard stories of individuals and saw for ourselves the demolished and burned out houses. General statistics of towns in trouble don't move us, but pictures of evacuated families reminded many of us of the ice storm of 1998 in Montreal or played on our own fears of floods, fires and homelessness.

Once touched personally, we could identify and help more. Personal stories such as my son's own flooded house, children living in a cold wet house with no hot food, with mould and two cars ruined so there is no escape – that gets you! Then they moved out and were without a home for three weeks – we called them the wandering Jews. What a great story. And when you get home, you have to fight with an insurance company and you don't have a car. Lovely!

All our charity organizations know how well we respond to this type of appeal. The kids lost their toys, books and TV. Descriptions of Jewish poverty being at a 30 per cent level don't get the philanthropic juices running. But tell a story with pictures of a mother and five abandoned children and the money pours in. I could decry this type of reaction, because it further victimizes the individual and represents the giver as a voyeuristic character in need of graphic inducement.

But my point is that we give better in these visual circum-

Norma Baumel Joseph

stances, because of our human need to personalize the situation. General pictures with statistics may be good for background and context, but they don't tell me enough. I need to know about real people, honest human situations that require help. The personal is political, and it gets me involved rather than artificially implicated.

Our view of Chanukah has also changed.

Today, we see the miracle differently. Jews called Maccabees stood up to religious persecution. They fought back and survived. It's a miracle of survival, and we tell the story with more individuals and more facts, not just oil and candles. Stories about individual families and their exploits are now more popular.

How will we tell the story of Israel? For me, the recent confrontation in Gaza is personal. How many times did my family run to the shelter? Were they always first? It was very important to my nephews to get there first. They had to buy decent pyjamas for public viewing. These little facts taught me about living under the effects of constant missile fire. What happens to a family when you have 15 seconds to get to a shelter? What happens to a village when you leave your elderly and sick alone, knowing they're totally exposed? Will the ceasefire last?

My nephew went back to sleeping in his underwear, so I guess the ceasefire is on.

Perl's back in business with new line of meats

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

At 87 years old, Herman Perl is glad to be back in business.

The founder and president of Perl's Fine Foods has begun manufacturing his products again for the first time since a fire destroyed his Bathurst Street store in 2006.

At his current factory on Densley Avenue, near Keele Street and Lawrence Avenue, Perl will manufacture and supply retailers with such Perl's favourites as salami, hot dogs, smoked turkey breast and drumsticks, as well as chicken and turkey deli slices.

Perl, a father of six, grandfather of 26 and great-grandfather of 20, said in an interview that for now, he won't produce the cooked foods that had become a staple at his store.

With 60 people working at Perl's before the fire, including 25 in the kitchen, the outlet, which opened on Bathurst just south of Lawrence in the early 1960s, had grown to become a community institution.

For Passover, for example, it sold about 5,500 pounds of gefilte fish and 4,700 pounds of chopped liver.

"We sold 50 gallons of chicken soup a day, five days a week, all year long," he said.

A Holocaust survivor from Romania, Perl was studying in Hungary when the war broke out and he was sent to Shachendorf concentration camp. He lost all his siblings and his step-mother in the Holocaust.

After the war, he went to Belgium, where he trained as a textile engineer.

"When I came to Toronto, my first job was [as] a textile engineer, and I made good money, about double what a weaver made, but my boss, a German Jew, said I had to work on Shabbat," Perl said.

"He tried to [compromise] by letting me work half a day, but I walked away."

Someone suggested that he open a butcher shop, "and even though I knew nothing about meat, I did. When one of my first customers wanted some middle chuck, I showed her a poster of a cow and asked her to point it out."

He opened his first store three weeks before Passover on Bloor Street in 1953, he said, and once, shortly after it opened, when he was too busy to deliver an order by car before yom tov, he walked with 75 pounds of meat from Bloor Street to Wilson Avenue.

The store became his life, he said.

"I would wake up at 4 a.m. and go to work, and sometimes I slept there. I learned everything on the job." Customer service was first for him, Perl said.

"I helped a lot of poor people by giving them meat or giving them a discount. I saw one customer shoplifting, and I said nothing, because I knew she didn't have money to feed her family."

Two years ago, Perl was honoured by Premier Dalton McGuinty and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem as one of a number of Holocaust survivors who have made contributions to their communities and Ontario.

Looking back, he said he thanks his former boss for letting him walk away.

Chabad of Markham celebrates 25 years

Nearly 400 people celebrated Chabad Lubavitch of Markham's 25th anniversary at a Nov. 13 gala dinner, testament to the growth of the congregation since its early days in the home of Rabbi Avraham Plotkin and his wife, Goldie.

The rabbi remembers that one Friday night, there were only nine men to make up the minyan, when someone knocked at his door.

"I didn't realize it was Halloween," Rabbi Plotkin told The C.J.N. "I asked the fellow in costume whether he was Jewish, and I pulled him in."

Rabbi Plotkin was 24 years old and his wife was 21 when they moved here from New York to reach out to unaffiliated Jews in the eastern part of Thornhill.

They bought a small house off Green Lane and began to have services in their living room.

After a couple of months, they renovated their basement to accommodate between 40 and 50 people for services, and on the High Holidays, they rented the Thornhill Community Centre.

Within three years, the congregation moved to a 4,000-square-foot warehouse on Guardsman Road, its home for the next decade.

Sixteen years ago, the congregation bought a property on Green Lane, its location since 1997, when it moved in to a new building on the site. Expansions over the years have included the addition of a mikvah in 2004.

But now, the 360-family congregation is "bursting out of our seams" and planning another expansion, said Goldie, who is director of the shul's Torah Tots preschool.

The challenge, she said, is that members' children are marrying and having their own children, and space is limited.

Even when there is no bar mitzvah on a Saturday morning, more than 200 people attend services, the rabbi said. "We don't impose any particular level [of observance], but we've seen an involvement, and to me that's the greatest joy."

Shul renovations are planned for the coming year, which will increase the capacity of the sanctuary by one-third, according to the congregation's president Paul Klein. As well, planned renovations include the addition of a social hall.

The work is expected to begin in March, once permits are approved. It's expected to be a four-month project, Klein said.

A government grant that was given to the shul will probably not materialize, because it is contingent on the work being completed by the end of March, he added. Klein and his wife, Chips, who like an estimated 75 percent of congregants are South African, have been with the congregation about 22 years.

"We were looking for an Orthodox shul in the neighbourhood," he recalled. Aside from Chabad Markham being the only one in the area, Klein said it was "exceptionally friendly, and very relaxed."

As well, the shul's focus on education appeals to him, and he has been in charge of the adult education component for years. "I think education is the key to Jewish survival. [Shul] is not just to provide a social setting, but to provide some place that's meaningful... [and] relevant to upcoming generations."

He said the shul is referred to as "the miracle of Markham, because we're stuck a little out of the mainstream [Jewish areas]."

Longtime member Sarah Konsker said that when she and her husband, Michael, moved into the area in 1979, there was no Orthodox shul within walking distance.

Konsker, who became observant after joining Chabad and now serves as the shul's mikvah attendant, was an early organizer of High Holiday services and Jewish couples' classes for a small group that met in private homes in the area, and was "very excited" when the Plotkins arrived.

"Our congregation is a wonderful, warm, involved congregation," she said. "I think everybody that is there really loves seeing each other... It's a wonderful community."

Beth Emeth's Torah reader is 'everybody's friend'

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

"Yehuda Rosenberg lives and breathes for the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda community," says the synagogue's spiritual leader, Rabbi Howard Morrison.

"And he helps many people in a wide variety of ways and this is all voluntary," Rabbi Morrison adds. "He is officially the Torah reader, but he is much more than that. He is everybody's friend."

Rosenberg, who is a plumber by profession, serves as Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue's ba'al koreh, the regular Torah reader, on Shabbat and holidays.

"He is Beth Emeth's unofficial plumber," says Rabbi Morrison, who cites Rosenberg as an example of human goodness.

Known as the key spirit of Toronto's Beth Emeth and dubbed the "Candy Man" by the children, he opens the doors of the synagogue every morning at 6 a.m. to study for an hour before attending the first minyan. As a volunteer, he reads from the Torah in the mornings, and he is often there to close the building in the evenings.

Rosenberg, 74, was born in Jerusalem. His family came to what was then Palestine in the early 1930s from Budapest and settled in a Hungarian haredi area. He has a sister who lives in Ma'alot, Israel.

Rosenberg began studying at the Talmud Torah in Yavne when he was three years old. He says by the age of seven, he "could daven by heart."

He was 10 years old when the State of Israel was declared. Four days after the declaration, his mother was killed when the Jordanians were shelling Jerusalem.

"My father was so broken. Our beautiful family fell apart. Our family was never together again," Rosenberg says.

When he was 15, an aunt brought him to Brooklyn, N.Y., where he studied at Yeshiva Torah Vodaath for three years.

In 1957, he was called back to Israel to serve in the Israel Defence Forces.

After he left the IDF, he decided to give up his religious practices. Then a cousin who had a plumbing company in Bnei Brak took him in as an apprentice.

In 1962, he married Rachel Halifa, whose family had been in Israel for seven generations. The following year, the couple came to Toronto, where Rosenberg had an uncle and cousin. Soon he established his own plumbing company.

The Rosenbergs have three sons, Yosi, Eddy and Elan, and a daughter, Judy. In 1974, the family joined Beth Emeth.

"We joined because we had to have bar mitzvahs for our sons, but then I only went to shul on the High Holidays," Rosenberg says.

His life changed when he was asked to read a section of the Torah at the aufruf of his son. At the time, the synagogue did not have a ba'al koreh.

"When I went up to read 24 years ago, everybody got quiet and asked, 'Who is the guy who is reading from the Torah?' After the service, Rabbi Joseph Kelman asked me if I would consider reading professionally for the synagogue. I refused, as I was not observant," Rosenberg says.

Yehuda Rosenberg reads from the Torah.

"Two years later, I realized that I wanted to go back to my roots, which I did. I went to Rabbi Kelman and said that I can now read at the shul."

He adds that with a little help from Fievel Zucker, the ba'al koreh of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, "I began a new life," Rosenberg says. "I have never missed a service in 22 years."

Rosenberg says he enjoys being with people, and he likes to cheer people up and to make them laugh. And along with hospital visits, leading services at shivah houses and teaching adults to lead the services, he particularly loves teaching young people for bar and bat mitzvah.

"I believe that anyone coming to shul should feel that people [will] come over to them and greet them and make sure that they are comfortable," he says. "And they should know where they are in the davening."

Looking back, he says, "If I could relive my life, I would have stayed in Israel. I hope to move back there in the future. And I also regret that I moved away from religion, but I am delighted that I found it again."

Speaking of the many acts of kindness and chesed he performs, he notes that he and his sister learned this as young children, from their mother.

"Our mother would go out and collect money for poor brides and their families," he recalls. "She set the example for her children."

And Rosenberg is setting the example for others.

The education of an Israeli chef

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

It came to him as a revelation on a misty mountain peak in Costa Rica.

When Benny Cohen completed his mandatory military service in Israel, he left the country to travel and see the world, as do many of his peers.

After arriving in Costa Rica, one of the countries he visited in Central America, Cohen went on a hike. Having reached the summit of a mountain after an arduous trek, he collected his thoughts.

"I decided to turn my interest in food into a profession," he recalled. "Thank God, it's been a good choice. I wake up each morning eager to get into the kitchen. I wake up in the middle of the night with ideas for new recipes."

Cohen, 36, is the executive chef of Mideastro, a Yorkville restaurant whose cuisine is a fusion of Mediterranean and Middle Eastern food.

Cohen, whose family hails from Morocco, combines the rustic fare of his parents' ancestral homeland with the flair and panache of French cooking.

He credits his Casablanca-born grandmother, Dina, with having inculcated in him a love of and appreciation for fine dining.

As a child growing up in Be'er Sheva, Cohen spent a great deal of his time with Dina because his parents were so busy working. Watching her whipping up a panoply of dishes, he developed a deep and abiding interest in cooking and baking.

By the age of five, he was a foodie. Later, he went to market early in the morning to buy the vegetables, fruits and meat for that day's meals. Finally, he had the pleasure of imbibing the heady aromas of Dina's culinary concoctions.

"I was hooked," he said.

From Dina, Cohen learned the rudiments of Moroccan cuisine, which was influenced by Arab and Berber tastes and relies on such spices as cinnamon, cumin, turmeric, ginger and coriander.

Dina showed him how to prepare some of the classics of the Moroccan table – lamb shank, fish stew, cold salads and dips. She also taught him the importance of letting the ingredients do their work and saving the spicing for the end.

Cohen was exposed to yet more earthy flavours during his travels in Greece, Turkey, Spain, Egypt, Jordan and Latin America following his army service as a combat soldier.

Upon returning to Israel, he studied at the School of Culinary Arts in Tel Aviv. He then apprenticed at Doxa, a Tel Aviv restaurant specializing in French Mediterranean food. Subsequently, he refined his palate at such Israeli restaurants as NG, Nana Bar and Messa Grill.

Having learned his craft in Tel Aviv, Cohen is convinced that the Israeli restaurant scene has morphed into one of the most vibrant in the region.

Cohen landed in Toronto four years ago to help a relative open a new restaurant. The venture floundered, but Cohen remained in Canada after accepting an offer from the owner of What-a-Bagel – a local bakery-cum-cafe chain – to devise a typical Israeli breakfast and brunch menu.

After finishing this job, he drew up a menu for Shoom, an Israeli-style Mediterranean bistro in Toronto.

Cohen joined Mideastro, owned by former Israeli Leon Goldstein, three years ago. At first, he worked in the Thornhill branch. But when Goldstein opened the downtown Mideastro on Yorkville Avenue near the new Four Seasons Hotel, he asked Cohen to take charge.

Typically, Cohen arrives at 9 a.m. and leaves before midnight. At around noon, he makes lunch for his wife, Noa, an El Al Airlines employee, and their two-year-old daughter, Mika, who, he says, is "one of the biggest foodies I know."

Cohen buys spices, ranging from cloves to cardamom, from suppliers in Morocco and Tunisia. "These spices are unlike any available here and open up new worlds," he said.

He imports fresh herbs and vegetables directly from Israel, but uses local produce during summer months.

Working with sous-chef Yishai Aharoni, like himself an Israeli, Cohen can usually whip up a complete meal within 15 minutes.

"The cuisine of the Middle East and Mediterranean is more sophisticated than just shawarma," he said one recent morning as he prepared himself for another long day. "I want to show people that it's complex in terms of flavour and presentation. It's one of the richest cuisines in the world today."

Deterrence not seen as effective weapon

Six million Jews in Israel can't rely in deterrence, he said.

Deterrence was a tactic that worked when the United States confronted the Soviet Union in a tense standoff, but it won't work with Iran because of its apocalyptic and messianic view of history, he warned.

Krauthammer said that while Israel has no intention of eradicating Iran or any of its Arab neighbours, Iran is dead set on destroying Israel, a United Nations member state.

Nasr, born in Tehran and the author of The Shia Revival and Democracy in Iran, conceded the world would be better off if Iran does not develop a weaponized nuclear program. But he acknowledged that Iran may yet succeed in fulfilling its ambition.

But he argued that like North Korea and the Soviet Union, Iran can be contained. "Iran is not impervious to containment," he said.

Disputing the notion that Iran's foreign policy is driven by messianism rather than cold national interest, Nasr noted that Iran last launched an attack on a neighbour in the mid-19th century.

He condemned the morality of the Iranian regime, but described it as a rational one.

He claimed that a nuclear-armed Iran could be deterred, just as the Soviet Union was at the height of the Cold War and Pakistan and India are today.

Americans, having endured wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, don't have an appetite for another war in Iran, he pointed out.

Admitting that neither Iraq nor Syria retaliated after their nuclear installations were bombed by Israel in 1981 and 2007, respectively, Nasr claimed that Iran would respond aggressively to an attack, plunging the Mideast into a full-scale war.

In a pre-debate vote on the resolution – "Be it resolved the world cannot tolerate an Iran with nuclear weapons capability" – 60 per cent of respondents voted yes, while 24 per cent voted no, while 16 per cent were undecided.

The post-debate tally was 58 per cent pro and 42 per cent con.

Taking Kids Out of Rocket Range
The Jewish Agency's Respite Activities

On Thursday, November 22nd, 500 children from Sderot were brought to Ramat Gan's Safari by The Jewish Agency, courtesy of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, whose immediate response to the crisis spearheaded a fantastic Canadian effort. The fun day provided the kids with a brief respite from the danger and fear of the constant sirens that have become part of their daily lives for the better part of a decade.

The children enjoyed a range of fun activities, hoping that the quiet that they enjoyed during the day will continue after they return to their homes in the South, following the ceasefire agreement. Deputy Chairman of the Executive of The Jewish Agency, Rany Trainin, joined the kids for part of the day.

Sderot has been the city hardest hit by the rockets, with its children in a near perpetual state of readiness for the worst. The town's Mayor, David Buskila has said in recent days, "The respite trips organized by The Jewish Agency are life altering for the participants. The organization has been highly professional."

The visit to the Safari, sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, was part of a massive respite effort which has already resulted in more than 9,000 children and teenagers from southern Israel enjoying themselves at different entertainment venues in safer parts of the country. The costs of the Jewish Agency's respite activities have been covered by Jewish Federations of North America, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Federation CJA (Montreal) and the Jewish Federations of Canada-UJA.

This brings the number of children taken for rest, fun and fresh air and, more importantly, their safety, to 30,000 last week alone.

Canada Post rejects union's expenses claim

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Canada Post says it will not reimburse the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) when it submits its expenses for a trip to a political conference in Brazil.

The Crown corporation is not obliged to fund the Nov. 28-Dec. 1 trip to the World Social Forum's Free Palestine conference, said Canada Post spokesperson Jon Hamilton. "Not one dime of Canada Post money will support this union trip."

However, CUPW national president Denis Lemelin said the union has been staging similar trips for 12 years, and under terms of the union's collective agreement, it has always been compensated for the costs involved. "This is the first time for return to sender," he said.

Lemelin said he expected CUPW and Canada Post to resolve the issue.

Under the union's collective bargaining agreement, the union can draw from a $200,000 global solidarity fund. The purpose of the fund is to maintain relationships with other postal workers around the world.

Lemelin said the visit to Brazil by a delegation of five Canadian postal workers included discussions with international colleagues on postal issues. "It's in line with the fund."

However Hamilton said the focus on Palestine indicates the conference was political in nature and should not be covered by the fund.

The Toronto Sun reported that one of the sessions at the Porte Alegre conference called for the release of Ahmad Saadat from an Israeli jail.

Saadat was sentenced in 2008 to 30 years in prison for heading the left-wing terrorist Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) and for orchestrating the 2001 assassination of Israeli tourism minister Rehavam Ze'evi.

Canada Post received several letters objecting to the use of the fund to support a political initiative, Hamilton said.

Late last week, B'nai Brith Canada issued a news release titled, "CUPW goes postal with taxpayer dollars."

B'nai Brith said it was "outraged by CUPW misusing taxpayer dollars to single out the Jewish state of Israel for contempt and hatred." It called the trip an "abuse of taxpayer funds" and it called on the government "to assure the public that taxpayer dollars will not be abused by CUPW in this manner. Whether funding the pro-Hamas Gaza flotilla campaign or testifying before the Canadian Parliament trying to split hairs between antisemitism and anti-Zionism, CUPW has again discredited itself by obsessing on this issue."

"Their absurdity is highlighted by the fact that Israel is a leader in workers' rights," said B'nai Brith CEO Frank Dimant.

Lemelin rejected suggestions the union had misused taxpayer funds. The money used to reimburse union members abroad were negotiated and are part of the collective agreement, he said. Had the fund not been included in the collective agreement, he suggested that wages or other benefits would have been higher.

Appendix R of the collective bargaining agreement, cited by Hamilton, states that "the fund shall be used exclusively to allow the union and its members who are employees of the corporation to develop and maintain a relationship and exchange with postal workers from other countries and their unions."

Israeli Arabs want a binational state: scholar

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A silent vigil by Israeli Arab students at Haifa University on Nov. 16 in memory of Hamas' assassinated military commander was a clear sign that many Arabs in Israel hope to be recognized as "Palestinian Arab citizens" of the Jewish state, says a scholar.

Oded Haklai, a Queen's University political scientist born and raised in Israel, was referring to Ahmed Jabari, who was killed by an Israeli drone strike on the first day of Israel's current offensive in the Gaza Strip.

In an interview, Haklai – the author of Palestinian Ethnonationalism in Israel published recently by the University of Pennsylvania Press – said that more than 50 per cent of Israeli Arabs regard themselves as "Palestinian citizens of Israel."

The term 'Israeli Arab' is now associated with "state control of a national minority," said Haklai, who was in Toronto last week to deliver a lecture on this subject at a Canadian Friends of Peace Now forum.

"Among the educated elite of Arabs in Israel, 'Israeli Arab' is a derogatory expression," he added. "Among the Arab masses, 'Arabs in Israel' is the preferred term."

Haklai, a Hebrew University of Jerusalem graduate and a resident of Canada since 1998, said that Israeli Arabs who identify as Palestinians hunger for the day when Israel will be replaced by a binational state. They also consider Israel to be an imperialist western implant in the Middle East.

Due to such beliefs, more than half of the Jews in Israel claim that Israeli Arabs are Fifth Columnists, he suggested.

Palestinian Arab citizens of Israel demand major changes in Israeli society, Haklai said.

Voicing their demands through communal organizations, they want to be formally recognized as a national and indigenous minority and desire autonomous political institutions, a separate parliament and Arabic-language protection. They also want the Arab education system to be more autonomous.

In addition, they demand a proportional allocation of state resources for their community and proportional representation in state institutions and government.

Most importantly, they seek to de-Judaize Israel's "public space" so that Israeli national symbols like the Star of David flag and the Hatikvah national anthem are modified to reflect the fact that Israeli Arabs account for about 20 per cent of Israel's current population.

"They reject the idea that Israeli Jews are a national group and have national and historical ties to the land," he noted. "But they recognize a national Jewish identity in Israel."

According to Haklai, Israeli Arabs who subscribe to these ideas see themselves as a disaffected, though not subversive, minority.

In his estimation, their demands are likely to be rejected by Israel, with the result that Israeli society will become even more polarized than it is today.

"Their demands are a challenge, but not a threat, to Israel's Jewish identity," he said. "But Jews in Israel, as well as some people in the Israeli government, regard them as a serious threat."

Israeli Arabs will be in a better position to press for their demands if, as some demographers predict, they form one-third of Israel's population within 25 to 50 years. "They may get increased autonomy and more of a share of public resources," he said. "But I doubt whether their demand for de-Judaization will be accepted."

Their demands pose a threat to prospects for peace between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, he observed.

"They add another layer of complexity to peace talks," he said, adding that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's insistence that Israel be officially recognized as a Jewish state by the Palestinians is partially due to demands for a binational state on the part of some Israeli Arabs.

Claiming that the gap between Jews and Arabs in Israel will continue to grow in the future, Haklai said he doubts whether Palestinian Arab citizens in Israel will resort to violence to achieve their aims.

"They will go through normal channels – political parties, the media and the courts."

At present, he said, Israeli Arabs are second-class citizens because the financial allocations their communities receive from the government are proportionally less than those received by Jews.

Israeli Arabs, too, are the victims of discrimination in employment and housing, he pointed out.

Nonetheless, they are substantially better off today than they were in the 1950s or 1970s.

Israel should come to grips with this problem, ultimately its most urgent one, by taking affirmative-action measures to narrow the Jewish-Arab gap.

The electoral system should be modified so that the threshold for winning a seat in parliament changes from two to five per cent. If this happens, Israeli Arab extremists will most likely be shut out of the Knesset, he said.

Further, Israeli Arab moderates running for office should be rewarded by being included in coalition governments.

And Israel should ensure that economic development takes place in the Arab sector. Currently, the Israeli government provides incentives to employers to hire Arabs, he said.

Haklai, a 40-year-old native of Jerusalem, said he began to delve into this topic after nationwide rioting broke out in Israeli Arab towns and villages in October 2000 in support of the Palestinian uprising in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"The riots caught me by surprise," he explained. "I decided to investigate."

Abdul inspired by Gene Kelly

Abdul rose from a cheerleader for the Los Angeles Lakers to a highly sought-after choreographer. With six No. 1 singles on the Billboard Hot 100 and a Grammy for Best Music Video, Opposites Attract, she went on to win twice the Prime-time Emmy Award for Outstanding Choreography, as well as numerous MTV Music Video Awards.

Along with judging American Idol, she has also judged The X-Factor, Live to Dance and, most recently, Dancing with the Stars. Abdul has her own star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame.

Abdul told the audience that her inspiration was dancer Gene Kelly. "When I was four years old watching Singin' in the Rain with my family, I kept moving closer and closer to the television. I remember kissing it and saying, 'He's my dad,' about Gene Kelly. My mother said, 'No, this is your dad' – pointing to my dad – and that can be your TV dad." I said, "That's what I am going to do, dance just like him."

Soft-spoken, Abdul was upfront and candid as she shared several stories throughout the evening. "My parents instilled in me the act of gratitude, and it is how I lead my life," she said. "I connect with people. That is my famous gift."

Paula Abdul

Rabbi Mentz described Abdul as "a beautiful Jewish neshamah – that is what I see in Paula. A beautiful Jewish girl, inside and out."

Guest Nathan Disenhouse, president of Jewish National Fund of Canada, said, "It is great that the community has come out in strength to build this new synagogue. It is needed in the area. After many years of having to rent space, I am pleased that Chabad on the Avenue is able to get a permanent home for themselves," he said.

The evening was presented by brothers Jian Magen and Page Magen, co-founders of Magen Boys Entertainment, and Abby Tobias, president of Sole Power Productions. "We wanted to put on an event that people will remember for a long time. Paula Abdul is a legend, and we are honoured to have the opportunity to work with her," Jian said.

With 50 sponsors, the evening featured a live auction of art, music and sports memorabilia, a hotel package, and jewelry.

Students take part in Jewish life in Sweden

Renée Zatzman and Alexandra Schwarz
Special to The CJN

MALMO, Sweden — Having completed two years of studies at the Schulich School of Law at Dalhousie University in Halifax, we were excited at the prospect of studying abroad in our final year. While our acceptance to Lund University in Sweden was at first well received, we experienced apprehension after we researched Jewish life in our host country.

There were several news reports concerning antisemitism in the neighbouring city of Malmö, and the Simon Wiesenthal Center had issued a travel advisory informing Jews to take extreme caution when visiting the area. We wondered if we would feel safe and would be able to continue our involvement in Jewish student life.

Our exchange term overlapped with some of the most significant holidays in the Jewish calendar. Despite our families' mixed feelings, attending services and participating in meals felt like a necessity, both to uphold our traditions and to demonstrate that we would not be intimidated by antisemitic sentiment.

Our first exposure to Jewish life in Sweden was Rosh Hashanah. Alexandra phoned the local rabbi, Shneur Kesselman, to inquire about services. He explained that the Malmö synagogue would be safe and encouraged us to attend. Knowing that we were far from home during the holidays, the rabbi and the rebbetzin were very kind and invited us into their home for several meals. At the first dinner, they hosted Jews from around the world whose varying and interesting life tales had led them to the same table. The rabbi's ability to bring different people together to share apples and honey created a special experience.

Thus, in spite of our initial uneasiness, after the dinner we decided to celebrate Rosh Hashanah as we did every year: in shul with our fellow Jews. Apart from the sermon conducted entirely in Swedish during which the only words we understood were "Toronto" and "Chabad," we immediately felt a sense of familiarity, as the service was very similar to our own in Canada. Our comfort level grew as we sang prayers together, and several congregants greeted us and asked if we had a meal to attend.

Ten days later, we arrived at the synagogue for Kol Nidre. Barricades blocked the street adjacent to the synagogue, and several armed police, in addition to the private guards, stood outside. We were requested to give our passports and were quizzed on Yom Kippur before being permitted to enter. It was evident that security had been heightened. We were momentarily distracted from any fears as we searched for the rabbi, who had planned to accompany us to light yahrzeit candles in the Jewish community centre nearby. With sundown fast approaching, we realized that a miscommunication might make this impossible. However, with minutes to spare, and with a full congregation inside the synagogue, the three of us ran outside together and, thankfully, made it to the centre on time. After attending services and keeping the fast, we rewarded ourselves with a traditional breakfast meal, as luckily, lox and bagels are plentiful in Sweden.

Three days later, we discovered that there was an explosion at the very same JCC in which we had lit our yahrzeit candles. Various news outlets around the world, including this newspaper, reported on the incident. While there were no injuries, the building was damaged, and we wondered if it would be safe to attend a meal in the sukkah with other students the following week.

Ultimately, we decided that we should not be fearful of celebrating Sukkot in Malmö, and we looked forward to meeting local and international students from the area. We left the meal with a greater understanding of the holiday and established connections with several students who welcomed our addition to their local Facebook group and events. Renée attended a Shabbat meal organized by Swedish students, and while there were language barriers at times, shared experiences at summer camp, Hebrew school and in Jewish organizations brought everyone closer. We look forward to celebrating Chanukah and more Shabbats together in December.

Our time here is quickly coming to a close, and we are incredibly grateful for this positive experience. The community's generosity has helped us adjust to life away from home and has given us a greater appreciation for something that can easily be taken for granted in Canada: the ability to openly practise our faith without fear. Despite the many challenges facing this community, we are amazed by its strength and kindness. We will always share a special connection with the Jews of Malmö.

Renée Zatzman of Halifax and Alexandra Schwarz of Thornhill, Ont., are co-presidents of the Jewish Law Students' Association at the Schulich School of Law at Dalhousie University. They are currently studying at Lund University in Lund, Sweden.

Guelph campus welcomes new rabbi

Sammy Hudes
Special to The CJN

For Jewish students at the University of Guelph, this school year has marked the first time they've had their own campus rabbi, thanks to a new partnership between Hillel Canada and the Orthodox Union.

Rabbi Daniel Levitt was hired as Guelph Hillel's new director for the 2012-13 academic year, in addition to serving as the university's campus rabbi as part of the OU's Jewish Learning Initiative on Campus (JLIC) initiative.

Rabbi Daniel Levitt with his wife Naomi, son Yonah, and daughter Leah

This dual role is an experimental project between the two organizations, as Rabbi Levitt is the first JLIC rabbi to also serve as a Hillel director on a university campus, he said.

"It's never happened before," Rabbi Levitt said. "I have responsibilities in building religious life and educational programming on campus, in addition to the social cultural stuff that was already going on."

Rabbi Levitt, along with his wife Naomi and their two children, came to Guelph after spending two years in Nashville, Tenn., where he served as an assistant rabbi at a synagogue and campus rabbi for Vanderbilt University.

The OU typically sends rabbinic couples to campuses where there are large Orthodox populations to work alongside Hillel, Rabbi Levitt said.

While this isn't the case at Guelph, the growing Jewish population at the university presented the need for some sort of religious programming.

Hillel says it has 450 students on its mailing list, but it estimates that the number of Jewish students on campus could be more than double that number. Guelph has about 22,000 students in total.

"From Hillel Canada's perspective, by partnering with the OU they can bring a more experienced, higher-calibre Jewish professional... to be able to provide, all under one salary, more Jewish content, which is something that students are interested in," Rabbi Levitt said.

"We wanted someone who is a little more knowledgeable both in dealing with people and Jewish matters," said Rabbi Aaron Greenberg, JLIC director with Hillel of Greater Toronto, who was involved in the hiring process.

"Having that title does allow you to do certain things," Rabbi Greenberg said. "It gives you a lot of opportunity and a sense of respect on campus."

Choosing a JLIC couple also provides a female presence on campus, which can help Hillel better connect with female students, Rabbi Greenberg said.

While very few students at the university come from Orthodox backgrounds, Rabbi Greenberg said this isn't a problem for Rabbi Levitt in connecting with students on a personal level.

"What's great about Rabbi Daniel is he's not saying 'I'm a rabbi, I'm holier than you are.' He has [students] over for football, he hangs out with them and they really see him as a tremendous role model and someone who's very relatable."

In addition to monthly Shabbat dinners at the Hillel House, which have been offered in past years, Rabbi Levitt and his wife have opened their own home to students for Friday night and Saturday lunch meals.

"Many students have talked about how that was something they felt was missing," said Rabbi Levitt, who says he has also started hosting discussions over lunch on Jewish ethics and Torah throughout the week.

"Some of them didn't realize they felt it was missing until it was open to them."

In addition to Hillel, this is also the first year Chabad on Campus has had a presence at Guelph, and the two organizations say they plan to collaborate with one another in the future.

"We're discussing right now making a big Chanukah program together on campus," said Chabad Guelph co-director Rabbi Yehoshua Chanowitz, who moved into the new Chabad House less than three weeks ago with his wife Nechama and their family.

"Part of the need was the fact that there were so many more students coming here every single year, and many students were asking for a Chabad Centre to service their Jewish needs," he said.

Daniel Troster, a first-year Hillel representative, said that while he was initially hesitant about coming to Guelph, after hearing the city has a small Jewish community, he is very pleased with all the new resources available for Jewish students on campus.

"When I heard about Guelph Hillel and I heard about their philosophy and what they do, it really helped my decision to come to Guelph," Troster said.

"I feel like there's a lot of Jewish students who don't choose this university, because they feel that there's not enough Jewish people. Hopefully Jewish life on campus will increase."

Why is the shamash on a pedestal?

Rabbi Yossi Michalowitz

The Chanukah menorah is such a beautiful sight! Every night we add a new flame until we have eight in a straight row. The shamash is also part of the chanukiyah, yet it's not next to all the other flames. It has a unique placement. It's not permitted to be in the same row as the rest, and many chanukiyot are designed with the shamash higher than the rest. Why the special treatment?

To better understand the uniqueness of the shamash, we need to know what the word "shamash" means. The best way to understand what a word means is by looking at the first time the word is mentioned in the Torah. At the covenant between the parts between God and Abraham, Bereshit 15, 12 we read: "Tayehi hashmash javo" – and the shemesh was setting. This is the first time the Torah refers to that "Great light to rule by day." Bereshit 1, 16 – the sun – as the shemesh. How strange! The word shemesh literally means a servant. Why is the Torah referring to the mighty great light that rules by day as a servant?

More importantly, why does the Torah refer to the sun as the shemesh in relation to a covenant that God made with Abraham? Abraham lived in a pagan world that attributed divinity to anything that exerted power over mankind. Abraham's contribution to the world was that he understood that no matter how powerful anything may be – even if it is a "great light" that rules by day, that heats up and illuminates the entire solar system and provides photosynthesis, enabling life on earth – it's still a shemesh, a servant of God.

Rabbinic Reflections

Abraham understood that everything in the universe has a purpose through its connection to serving God to make the world a place where the Divine presence can reside. Everything has the ability to mirror the kindness of God in this world. Abraham's entire life was a manifestation of being the ultimate human shemesh, as he introduced kindness to the world. When everything in the universe is perceived by mankind as a servant of God's kindness to the world, then the world has achieved its purpose. Disconnecting powerful things from the ultimate source leads to paganism. Abraham succeeded to such an extent that God desired to make an eternal covenant with him and promised him the Land of Israel. This is the best time to introduce to the world what the most powerful force in our universe really is – a shemesh, a servant.

The Chanukah story involves the battle between the pagan forces of Greece and the Jewish belief that everything serves God. The chanukiyah is a symbol of Jewish victory, that God indeed runs the world and can make oil miraculously burn for eight days, hence the eight flames. But those eight flames cannot represent anything if there's nothing to serve them and enable them to illuminate.

The shamash fits that role. There's no mitzvah to light a shamash, but without its dutiful sole existence of serving God to enable the mitzvah to be done, we would have no light at all. Something or someone that focuses on the will of God alone deserves special treatment, and, yes, to even be higher than all the rest.

Rabbi Yossi Michalowitz is spiritual leader of the Westmount Shul in Thornhill, Ont.

Damages beyond and within our control

One of the least talked about aspects of war is the economic fallout. While in general terms, estimates of the assessed damage are tallied, the day-to-day personal impact is rarely discussed.

What happens if a wedding needs to be postponed due to the family's inability to fly in or the groom being called for army service? Can the caterer demand payment for services that were not actually rendered, but for which costs may have been incurred? Can the family demand their deposit back?

Jewish law teaches that one is fully liable for any damages he may cause, "whether accidentally or willfully; whether his is awake or sleeping." However Jewish law does not require payment if damages were caused indirectly. A talmudic example of such is placing a ladder next to a pigeon coop, which then allows a weasel to climb up the ladder and kill the pigeons.

Despite being morally unacceptable, not every moral wrong carries a financial payment. Such payments could only be enforced in a clearly spelled out contract delineating the impact of unforeseeable events.

In the modern economy, where what happens in China, not to mention the United States, has a huge impact economically on Canadians, we well understand how events beyond our control affect us. We're often the victims of unforeseen events. And at times we may be victims of more predictable events, such as when those who are not held accountable for their actions cause damage. Such is the case when a minor kicks a soccer ball through our window. While contemporary practice, and imals. People leading animals in the marketplace had to ensure safe passage for others. To use the talmudic example, if someone loads his animal with barley and the barley edges protrude into a store and catch fire from a candle in the store, the animal's owner would be liable for the ensuing damages. Conversely, if the store's owner places his candle outside the store, he would be liable for damages caused.

An interesting debate ensues in the case where a storeowner places his Chanukah candles on the street. The overarching theme of Chanukah is "publicizing the miracle," and the optimal place for lighting candles is outside, in full view of passersby – something quite common in Israel today.

Thus the talmudic sage Rav Yehuda rules that Chanukah is an exception to the above rule, and the storeowner would be exempt from payment. Yet Jewish law rules in accordance with the sages that Chanukah candles or not, a storeowner who puts a candle in a public area is liable for damages. One has the right to walk unencumbered on the street, and one's religious obligations cannot be fulfilled at the expense of inconveniencing others.

moral correctness, may demand that a parent pay for the damages, from a Jewish legal perspective, there's little one can do. Minors can't be made to pay damages, and parents can't be made to pay for damages they did not cause.

Yet liability does extend beyond one's self, as can be seen from the laws of torts and Chanukah. Ancient marketplaces were often narrow and would be lined with stores, customers, passersby and even ani-

Gaon of Vilna was a great scholar of Jewish texts

The last decades of the 18th century were a critical time in Jewish history. Moses Mendelssohn (1729-1786) and his circle of friends and colleagues had recently initiated the Haskalah, the Enlightenment movement that would soon lead to Jewish religious and political reform. In the first steps of emancipation in many European countries Jews acquired greater civil rights and became more integrated into general society, even as they themselves questioned whether this was a positive development. Modern Judaism was emerging.

A new book by the Israeli scholar Arie Morgenstern, The Gaon of Vilna and His Messianic Vision, translated from Hebrew into English by Naftali Greenwood, concentrates on this period but is almost silent on these modernizing trends. Instead, it focuses on the arch-traditionalists of this period, both the Chassidim and their opponents, the Mitnaggedim, whose revered leader was Rabbi Elijah, the Gaon of Vilna (1720-1797).

The book is disorganized and is generally not an easy read. Its title in English is misleading, since the Gaon of Vilna is hardly mentioned until near the end of the book. The original Hebrew title, Mistikah u-meshihiyut [Mysticism and Messianism] is much more apt. The English of the translation includes poor grammar and clumsy and unidiomatic English phrases. But the reader who toughs it out will learn much of interest.

Large numbers of Jewish mystics – Chassidim and Mitnaggedim, Ashkenazim and Sephardim – moved to the Land of Israel in the 18th and early 19th centuries in the sincere conviction that their aliyah would bring the coming of the messiah nearer. They had calculated that various specific dates between 1740 and 1781 would be propitious times for the messiah to come. Just a century after the debacle of the false messianic movement of Shabbetai Tzvi, many Jews were still concentrating their energies on “calculating the end.”

Morgenstern tells the story of the aliyah of many of these Jews who often adopted extreme standards of piety (in particular in areas of public morality and sexuality) in order to force God's redemptive hand. From our perspective today it is ironic that contemporary arch-traditionalists often dismiss Zionism for allegedly trying to bring redemption without waiting for the messiah. In the 18th century, it was the arch-traditionalists who were moving to Israel because they did not want to wait for God to act.

The part of the book that does discuss the Gaon of Vilna is the most interesting. One of the great scholars of Jewish texts – both legal and mystical – at all times, the Gaon was for much of his life a recluse who studied constantly, rarely talking with other people.

even his own family. It is hard to separate fact from fiction in stories of such wunderrabbis, but his disciples related that the Gaon slept only two hours a day, in half-hour shifts, and that he had his wife prepare bread soaked in water for his meals so that he would not have to waste time chewing his food and so that his eating would be solely for nourishment, not pleasure.

In 1778, the Gaon set off from Vilna for the Land of Israel but changed his mind and came back. Why did he leave and why did he return? Some documents locate the Gaon in Amsterdam and The Hague in 1778; yet Holland is not on the way from Lithuania to the Land of Israel. Morgenstern uses archival materials in a number of countries and, like a detective, assembles the puzzle pieces into a credible reconstruction of the Gaon's aborted attempt to move to the Land of Israel.

The Gaon, like many other mystics of his time, was convinced that the coming of the messiah was imminent and that he could help the process by moving to the Holy Land. Like many mystics, he was interested in finding the Ten Lost Tribes. He had also often said that, basing himself on the principles of Jewish mysticism, he planned to write the last, definitive code of Jewish Law, a code that no one would question, and that would replace the Shulchan Arukh. He hoped it would be yet another harbinger of the messianic age, but he never wrote it.

So he set out for Israel for the same reason that many 18th-century Jews did – to help usher in the messianic age. But why did he go through Holland? Before leaving Lithuania, he had told a student that he had solved all the riddles of Jewish mysticism except for two. Morgenstern here reports on a letter from before 1778 from the Gaon's brother to a rabbi in Amsterdam who had access to two rare books of Jewish mysticism for which the Gaon's brother was willing to pay a hefty price (apparently for the Gaon's use).

Morgenstern also proves that The Hague was a centre of great Jewish excitement in the 1770s about the alleged finding of the Ten Lost Tribes. The Gaon, Morgenstern suggests, set out for the Holy Land via Holland, hoping to solve there his last two quandaries about Jewish mysticism and find traces of the Ten Lost Tribes. Apparently his Dutch mission failed. He came back to Vilna and was in some ways a changed man for the last decade of his life. But he passed on his love of the Land of Israel to his disciples, many of whom moved there after the Gaon's death.

As I read this book I could not help thinking of how unusual a time the end of the 18th century was. In many places in Europe, particularly western and central Europe, Jewish founders of the Enlightenment were concentrating their efforts on returning the Jews to history. At the same time, arch-traditionalist Jews, mostly from eastern Europe, were convinced that the only improvement for Jews would be if they could force God to intervene by sending the messiah, thus essentially removing the Jews from history.

AJC mulls ways to help small communities

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — While threats in Israel were on the minds of Atlantic Jewish Canadians, revitalizing small Jewish communities generated the most discussion at the 18th biennial convention of the Atlantic Jewish Council.

The weekend event, held Nov. 23 to 25, brought community leaders from across the region to Halifax for informational, educational and celebratory events.

In his presidential address, newly elected AJC head Michael Argand of Halifax stressed the need for more young people to be involved in regional and local activities.

"I promise you that in two years, you will all feel part of the community," the 60-something businessman told younger attendees. "We can recapture that 25-45-year-old age group to a sense of Jewish involvement. But you must volunteer yourselves to be part of this growth."

Argand was elected for a two-year term, succeeding Shulamith Medjuck, also of Halifax. Chosen to the executive were Haligonians Howard Conter as first vice-president, Howard Budovitch as second vice-president, Nana Shteinberg as treasurer, and Marilyn Kaufman, who hails from Fredericton, as secretary.

In a Sunday discussion group, a score of under-40 participants talked about creating non-synagogue based social and Jewish cultural events to draw in that demographic.

It was suggested that the community should find a "volunteer" volunteer co-ordinator to organize strong Jewish programs such as Shabbat dinners in private homes, while discovering the skills and interests of the younger demographic so programs of value can be offered to them.

It was also stressed that younger community members should become involved in the AJC's executive structure in order to give continuity to its future.

Immigration is growing in the region – Halifax has attracted 70 new Jewish families since 2008 – and a session co-ordinated by mostly Israeli newcomers revealed that their main concerns are connecting children to the community, finding employment, and retaining their children's Israeli culture by teaching Hebrew language skills (at Hebrew school) to newcomer children who are growing up as English-only speakers.

Also attending as speakers and panelists were Joel Lion, Israel's consul general to Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, Jewish National Fund of Canada CEO Josh Cooper, Jewish Federations of Canada-UJA chair Marc Gold and CEO Linda Kislowitz, and Jordan Kerbel, deputy director of communications and advocacy training for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Kerbel headed a discussion about pro-Israel advocacy and overcoming antisemitic and anti-Israel sentiment in the media. He suggested that local Jews engage their non-Jewish friends by spreading positive social media items.

"We also have to educate our own communities," he said. "We have to understand the reasons that Israel deserves to be our own homeland and ramp up our education to those who don't know. We must get to our friends in local media for more positive coverage and write letters to the editor to combat anti-Israel sentiment."

He concluded, "Always speak positively about what Israel is. Never talk negatively."

Lion, who earlier sat on a panel with Kerbel about the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel, carried the positive theme further.

"In 65 years, Israel has gone from nothing to everything. We mustn't defend Israel. We have to celebrate it. Give the message 'Look where we are. Look what we have given the world.'"

He said people should overcome the criticism of Israel as "an apartheid state" by coming to Israel and "seeing what's really there. We have won the Middle East because we continue to exist, innovate, invent. The others dance on the blood of the dead."

Community members Kathy Silbert and Lloyd Newman, both of Halifax, and Harry Gorber, of Moncton, were recognized for their longtime commitments to their local communities and their contributions to Israel through organizational involvements.

Abbas' unilateral move only prolongs the conflict

It's no mere coincidence that the vote last week at the United Nations General Assembly on Palestinian non-member observer status came on Nov. 29, the 65th anniversary of the famous partition resolution of Nov. 29, 1947. But it is ironic.

After all, the partition resolution called for the creation of both "Jewish" and "Arab" states in Palestine. The Jews accepted the plan, but the Arabs, including the Palestinian leadership, violently rejected it.

To this day, the Palestinian leadership, headed by Palestinian Authority President and PLO chairman Mahmoud Abbas, refuses to accept what they rejected 65 years ago – the right of the Jewish people to self-determination. They speak of recognizing the State of Israel, but not of Israel as the homeland of the Jewish people. To accept the latter would amount to giving up their claim of a "right of return" of Palestinian refugees and their descendants to present-day Israel. This they refuse to do.

So instead of putting an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict, as called for in UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, the Palestinians are, in effect, protracting it.

To understand how crucial the distinction drawn above is, you only have to read Israel's UN ambassador Ron Prossor's 1,800-word address to the General Assembly on Nov. 27, which followed Abbas' 3,800-word speech.

Whereas Abbas mentioned Muslim and Christian, but not Jewish, connections to the Holy Land, Prossor objected that Abbas' refusal to acknowledge the Jewish historical connection to the land, a 4,000-year-old attachment, and in particular the Jewish attachment to Jerusalem, means that the Palestinians still refuse to accept the basic concept enshrined in the original partition plan – two states for two peoples. As Abbas made clear, he accepts self-determination only for the Palestinian people. By contrast, the overwhelming majority of Israelis recognize the legitimate political aspirations of the Palestinian people and ask only for reciprocal recognition.

The refusal of the Palestinians to accept the right of the Jewish people to any part of their ancestral homeland remains the crux of the failure to resolve the conflict.

In his Nov. 29 Globe and Mail opinion piece, "How not to create Palestine," the brilliant Israeli writer Yossi Klein Halevi pointed to Israel's repeated, but rejected, efforts (in 2000 at Camp David and in 2008 during the Annapolis talks) to establish a Palestinian state. In evident frustration, he remarked: "Arguably, no stateless people has rejected offers of statehood as often as the Palestinians. And no other national movement seeks to empower its people on the ruins of another people's state. That is the real scandal of the Middle East conflict."

Unfortunately, this scandal is not appreciated in the international community, save for the relatively few who pay attention to the historic and diplomatic facts.

During his UN speech, Abbas insisted that by going to the General Assembly for an upgrade in the status of "Palestine," he was not violating previous PLO-Israel agreements. Yet all of these agreements call for negotiations between the parties as the only way to resolve the conflict.

In recognition of this principle, the lead Globe and Mail editorial of Dec. 1 asserted: "John Baird, the minister of foreign affairs, was right to forcefully argue against the resolution at the United Nations to grant the Palestinian Authority the status of non-member observer state."

Liberal MP Irwin Cotler (National Post, Nov. 30) and Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz (Jerusalem Post, Dec. 1) provided detailed accounts about how inimical Abbas' UN gambit is to a genuine two-state solution and about the dangers to the peace process that consequently lie ahead.

Others, however, including the National Post's Jonathan Kay, supported Abbas' move. Kay argued (Nov. 30) that Israel's settlement policy is counter-productive to the prospects for successful negotiations and that Abbas needed

"leverage" at the UN. While a strong defender of Israel on many of the basics mentioned above, Kay expressed impatience with Israel – a growing impatience that is eroding support in some key circles in the West that Israel could count on in the past.

More on this next week.

Radio host suspended after antisemitic call

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish groups are divided over whether a Montreal radio station has adequately dealt with an on-air host's handling of an antisemitic call and his own comments about the Jewish community.

On Nov. 26, CHMP 98.5FM announced it was suspending Jacques Fabi for one month and issued a written apology. Fabi also made a personal statement of regret.

The suspension stems from an incident late on

Nov. 21, during his overnight talk show on the French-language station, Fabi allowed a woman, who identified herself as Maria and of Arab origin, to rail against Israel's incursion in Gaza, comparing Israelis to dogs. She then called the "massacre of Jews" during the Holocaust "the most beautiful thing in history" and told Jews to "go to hell."

Fabi, who has worked in broadcasting for 35 years, responded that she "probably" had the democratic right to express her opinion, but that she should be aware that making negative comments about Israelis or Jews always has "consequences."

Then, he added that he finds the Montreal Jewish community annoying, using the crude word "enmerdant."

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), whose officials had called for Fabi's dismissal, said it is satisfied with the station's decision and acknowledged Fabi's apology. However, it is still going ahead with a complaint to the Canadian Broadcast Standards Council.

B'nai Brith Canada, which never asked that Fabi be fired, is not satisfied because, according to its legal counsel Steven Slimovitch, neither the station nor Fabi has addressed the real issue.

To him, the objection is not only that Fabi did not cut off the caller quickly enough, but that he was "almost complicit" with her in her diatribe against Israel and, more seriously, the Jewish People.

Both organizations would like to see the station and Fabi make on-air apologies, with Slimovitch adding that there should be a live discussion of the wrong that was committed.

On Nov. 26, the senior management of station owners Cogeco Diffusion issued an apology, via a wire service, which describes the caller's remarks as unacceptable and reprimands Fabi, whose suspension became effective on Nov. 21, the date of the incident.

Fabi also issued a personal apology and statement of regret.

Slimovitch said neither apology refers specifically to Fabi's interaction with the caller or his own remarks. Slimovitch also thinks any apology should be made accessible to the public, such as being posted on the station's website.

The station's manager, Réal Germain, had immediately responded to the community's complaints by affirming that what transpired would result in "severe sanctions" against Fabi. Fabi himself had offered his regrets on his Facebook page.

Tory pollster censured

MONTREAL — A polling company employed by the federal Conservative party has been censured by the marketing research industry for a telephone campaign it conducted a year ago in Mount Royal riding that led some to think Liberal MP Irwin Cotler was resigning. An independent three-member complaints panel struck by the Marketing Research and Intelligence Association (MRIA) concluded that the member firm, Ontario-based Campaign Research Inc., violated provisions of the MRIA's Code of Conduct and Good Practice.

The MRIA received seven formal complaints from people who had been polled by Campaign Support, at the time a division of Campaign Research, in the fall of 2011.

Campaign Research was hired by the Conservatives to identify potential voters in Mount Royal, which has been a Liberal stronghold since the 1940s. The callers were instructed to follow a script identifying themselves as working for Campaign Support on behalf of the Conservative party. They then were to ask if Prime Minister Stephen Harper could count on their support in "the upcoming election."

Cotler, the MP since 1999, was adamant at the time that he was not stepping down. Incensed, he made a formal complaint in the House of Commons, claiming his ability to carry out his parliamentary duties had been impeded by what he viewed as a misinformation campaign by the Tories.

Canadian Roma plead for Jewish support

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canadian Roma are seeking help from the Jewish community in shedding light on the difficulties being faced by their brethren overseas.

The creeping resurgence of neo-Nazism in various European Union countries is alarmingly similar to Nazi Germany in the late 1930s, particularly in Hungary, where Jews and Roma, pejoratively called "gypsies," are increasingly being harassed by far-right paramilitary groups with the tacit consent of the government, according to Gina Csanyi-Robah, executive director of the Roma Community Centre of Toronto.

Speaking to a mixed Jewish and Roma audience at Congregation Darchei Noam on Nov. 18, Csanyi-Robah, a Canadian-born Roma whose family immigrated to Toronto in 1956, invoked the twin spectres of Adolf Hitler and his World War II-era Hungarian ally, Ferenc Szálasi, leader of the country's ultra-nationalist Arrow Cross Party, in order to convey the gravity of recent events in Hungary.

"There is a saying among my people: 'Our ashes were mingled in the ovens,'" Csanyi-Robah told The C/JN, referring to the death of both Roma and Jews at the hand of the Nazis in World War II.

"I was shocked when I learned what was happening to my people in Europe," she said. "Even here in Canada, there are stereotypes [being applied] associating Roma with criminality. My people are in apartheid-like conditions in Hungary, and we hear nothing about it in Canadian media."

There are an estimated 15 million Roma scattered across Europe, all of varying faiths, including some Jewish Roma.

Depending on estimates, anywhere from 500,000 and two million Roma were murdered along with six million Jews as part of Hitler's "final solution."

Which is why Csanyi-Robah believes that turning to the Jewish community and invoking the sentiment of "never again" may help Roma in Canada and Hungary head off an imminent humanitarian disaster, if not a new genocide.

Citing Hungary's ultranationalist Jobbik party – which holds 47 seats in the Hungarian parliament – and its numerous paramilitary offshoots, she said the situation for the Roma is becoming increasingly desperate, with unemployment rates in the community at close to 85 per cent, increasing societal marginalization and near-daily intimidation, both psychological and physical, by emboldened far-right ethnic Hungarians.

In 2010, the Jobbik party ran on a xenophobic platform and received 17 per cent of the popular vote, up from two per cent in 2006.

A 2011 United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees Canada report detailed cases of forced sterilization of Roma women in Hungary, the Czech Republic and Slovakia between 2000 and 2011 and called for increased state accountability in honouring the UN Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racism Against Women.

There are pending court cases across eastern Europe regarding alleged forced sterilization of Roma women as individuals begin speaking out on the sensitive subject.

It's for these reasons and others that a spike in Roma immigration applications to Canada has occurred over the last few years, according to Csanyi-Robah.

And Hungarian Jews are also being actively targeted, she said.

Jewish activists and organizations are increasingly calling on Hungary to curb the drift towards tolerated antisemitism in the country's political discourse.

Last June, in a letter to the speaker of the Hungarian parliament, Nobel Peace Prize winner Elie Wiesel returned the Order of Merit, Grand Cross – the country's highest honour, which he received in 2004 – over Hungary's recent honouring of World War II-era Hungarian parliamentarian Jozsef Nyiro, a Nazi sympathizer and Hitler supporter.

In August, after much protesting by Jewish activists in Budapest, the city's mayor grudgingly announced the cancellation of an antisemitic play at one of the city's municipally funded theatres.

The play, The Sixth Coffin, is set in 1920s France and featured a cabal of powerful Jews plotting to destroy Hungary and plunge humanity into another world war shortly after the end of the first one.

On Nov. 27, Marton Gyongyosi, Jobbik's deputy party leader, stated in parliament that the recent Israel-Hamas conflict provided a timely opportunity to "tally up people of Jewish ancestry" in light of the Gaza conflict.

He later clarified his remarks, saying he only meant to list the number of Israelis living in Hungary.

It's this increasingly open nature of antisemitic public discourse in the country that has Rabbi Slomo Koves, chief rabbi of the Unified Hungarian Jewish Congregation, concerned for his community.

The Hungarian Jewish community totals around 100,000. Nearly 600,000 Hungarian Jews perished in the Holocaust.

Rabbi Koves told Reuters on Nov. 28 that "Jobbik has moved from representing medieval superstition to openly Nazi ideologies."

Last week, he said his organization would initiate a "criminal procedure" against Gyongyosi's "open Nazism in Canadian Roma hold a vigil in Toronto earlier this year for victims of racism in Hungary.

side Parliament."

Speaking to The C/JN from Budapest last week, Rabbi Koves said while it's still safe for Jews to move around publicly in Hungary, he fears that Jews could start to see persecution and repression similar to what the Roma are experiencing.

While antisemitism in Hungary "isn't a new development" he said, since 2006 it has been more worrisome, coinciding with the rise of the Jobbik party.

"It's not only on the rise, but it's becoming louder. When there are [economic] problems in society, antisemitism becomes stronger," Rabbi Koves said. The antisemitic and anti-Roma public discourse in Hungary "is terrible," he said, noting that numerous blood libel references have been made by Jobbik party members.

"Obviously, when people start speaking these things [in public] it's a concern, he said. But for now, he believes the Jewish community is still secure.

The Roma are a different matter, however.

The rabbi said the Jewish community is trying to help Hungarian Roma, but the task is difficult because the latter lacks organized community leadership.

"Their community is in such a bad situation that they're having a very hard time trying to build up their civil organizations that will stand up for them," he said. "If you ask me, the Roma community is the one in critical danger. In 2009, there were, I think, 10 cases of murder organized by [paramilitary] groups intent on killing Roma families. That's [public discourse] which has already translated into physical acts of violence. That's very scary."

Other EU countries have seen a dramatic rise in overt displays of antisemitism and anti-Roma sentiment as well, most notably Greece, where the nationalist Golden Dawn party currently holds 18 seats in parliament.

In France, the resurgent Front National party won two seats in the legislature in the 2012 national elections.

Jews labelled security threat

JNS.org

BUDAPEST — On Nov. 27, a Hungarian lawmaker from the far-right Jobbik party openly called for Jews to be registered on lists as threats to national security.

In the wake of international outrage at the Nazi-style request, as well as a protest outside the legislature in Budapest, lawmaker Marton Gyongyosi has refused to resign.

Gyongyosi subsequently claimed his words were taken out of context and that he was only speaking about Hungarian citizens who also hold Israeli passports.

Dan Shulman, Elliott Friedman & Brian Williams at UJA's Sports Night Talk Sports with Three of Canada's Top Sports Personalities on December 9th

By Daniel Horowitz

On July 27, 2012, during the Opening Ceremonies of the 2012 Olympic Games held in London, England, CTV broadcasters Brian Williams and Lisa LaFlamme took a passionate stand in support of a moment of silence for the eleven members of the Israeli national team who were murdered in Munich in 1972.

"As Israel prepares, my position is well known and it is one that I have taken at previous Olympics," said Williams as the Israeli team was being introduced that day.

"It is wrong that the IOC [International Olympic Committee] refuses to have a minute's silence for the Israeli athletes that were slaughtered in Munich. It is a much bigger issue this year, as it's the 40th anniversary of Munich... Dr. Roger [President of the IOC] says the ceremony is not the place to remember a tragic event, but - it's tragic - however it's one of the most significant and world-changing events in Olympic history. It absolutely should have been done here."

"The widow of one of the victims spoke out saying they came with dreams, they went home in coffins. They want to be remembered here tonight," added LaFlamme.

"And remember - they died as Olympians," said Williams, concluding his thoughts.

On Sunday, December 9th, 2012, members of Jewish Toronto have the opportunity to thank Williams, in person, at United Jewish Appeal's Sports Night, a unique round table discussion comprised of Williams, as well as the Toronto-born voice of ESPN, Dan Shulman, and Elliott Friedman of CBC's Hockey Night in Canada.

Moderated by Shulman, the panel discussion will cover the experts' opinions on the latest in sports. There will also be a special award presentation made to Williams for his courageous and public stand against the IOC.

"Having grown up in an observant family, having had my bar mitzvah in a Conservative shul, and having gone to Bialik for nine years, obviously anything to do with Judaism or Israel is of great importance to me, and I am more than happy to do anything I can to help out," said Shulman. "And when you combine a sports theme with a Jewish cause like this event, this is as up my alley as anything could be, so I'm thrilled to be part of this."

Those in attendance will have the chance to ask the questions that matter most to them during an interactive Q & A session, take part in a sports trivia contest, and even win a pair of tickets to see the Toronto Raptors play the New Orleans Hornets.

Whether it's the Argos winning the Grey Cup, the Blue Jays massive off-season trade or the London Olympics, don't miss this chance to talk sports with the pros.

The event will take place at the new Leo and Sala Goldhar Celebration Centre, Shirley Auslander Hall, on Vaughan's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, 9600 Bathurst Street.

Tickets are $25 and includes a dessert reception. RSVP online at ujaevents.com/registration/ujasportsnetwork, or by calling +16.635.2883 Ext. 5229 or jgonik@ujafed.org

Genesis: UJA's Centre for Jewish Innovation readies for opening

Daniel Horowitz

In 2009, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto hosted a think tank on the meaning and significance of social entrepreneurship. Panelists used the event to bounce ideas off of one another, one of which - creating an incubator to support young Jewish social entrepreneurs in Toronto - is now coming to fruition.

On January 31st, 2013, Genesis: UJA Federation's Centre for Jewish Innovation will be kicked off with a speaker series featuring Paul Alofs, CEO, Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation. Sharing a space with Hillel of Greater Toronto at UJA Federation's Wolford Centre for Jewish Campus Life, the Centre will also act as an incubator to supply five residents - Shores Jewish Environmental Programs, Project AIM, Jewish Business Network, Annex Shul, and JED Institute - with UJA Federation's resources, including office space, technical assistance, and access to programs and professional staff.

"This is an effort to support people in being creative, and in being involved with meaningful, non-profit projects that enrich Jewish life locally and around the world," said Alexandra Kuperman, a talented, young social entrepreneur who will also serve as the Centre's Director. "Toronto's leaders in social entrepreneurship will share lessons and provide mentorship, infusing a spirit of innovation into the Jewish community that allows us to support the success of the emerging Jewish start-up organizations in our community."

"Genesis will be a way for UJA Federation to leverage its organizational resources and support the work of young social entrepreneurs in Toronto," said Robin Gofine, UJA Federation's Vice-President of Strategic Community Planning and Engagement. "High-profile community leaders and volunteers have become involved, and we're all very excited about this cutting-edge, progressive initiative."

Such high-profile community members include Sherry Firestone, real estate developer; Sam Ifergan, venture capitalist; Alan Berg, computer entrepreneur; and Cheryl Reicin, a Torontonian LLP partner who will also serve as the Centre's Chair.

"Genesis is a convergence of community, collaboration and the entrepreneurial spirit," stated Reicin. "If we want our community large and strong, we need to reach out in different ways. Rather than us developing programs that speak to younger generations, it is a whole lot easier for us to supply the infrastructure and assistance to help them make their own ideas and programs successful."

Acting as an accelerator for non-profit organizations, Genesis supplies the future leaders of Jewish Toronto with the expertise and necessary skill sets to nurture and develop their businesses.

"Who could resist the idea of assisting amazing young people who themselves are motivated to effectuate change and fill important needs in the community?" asked Reicin.

Winnipeg's Izzy Peltz was dedicated to Jewish community

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Izzy Peltz, the former executive director of Winnipeg's main Jewish community organization, who passed away Nov. 23 at 91, was the quintessential public servant.

Peltz was born in Romania while his parents were en route to Canada. He grew up in Winnipeg's storied North End. He graduated from the University of Manitoba as a chartered accountant in 1947, the same year that he married Mary, also the child of Jewish immigrants. (Mary predeceased him in 2009.)

In 1974, Peltz walked away from a lucrative accounting practice to take on the directorship of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council at a time when this city's Jewish community was facing many challenges stemming from a declining and aging population.

"I worked with Izzy for a number of years as a volunteer," said Bob Freedman who succeeded Peltz as executive director of the WJCC (later renamed the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg) and who remains in that position 26 years later.

"He did a fantastic job in guiding a new organization," Freedman added, alluding to the fact the WJCC had just been formed through a merger of two pre-existing community-wide Jewish organizations — the Jewish Welfare Fund and the Winnipeg Congress Council.

"He was very meticulous. It was great working with him."

Laurie Mainster, a longtime close friend of Peltz, recalled how organized and methodical he was. "He did a lot of good work for the community at a time of transition," Mainster said. "He was a catalyst who was able to work well with people. There was a lot of respect for him in the community."

While still WJCC executive director, Peltz also took on the role of half-time executive director of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

Upon retiring from the WJCC in 1986, he moved full time into the role of executive director at the foundation, which he steered toward a strong and stable future. During his tenure, the organization's capital fund increased to $5.4 million. Today, that capital fund is close to $100 million.

"He was a mentor to me and a role model," said Marsha Cowan, the current foundation CEO, who worked with Peltz at both the WJCC and the foundation.

"Izzy's vision for a strong and vibrant Jewish community galvanized us to strive for greater heights. The seeds he planted many years ago, both at the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council and the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, have become a significant and compelling legacy that will continue to nourish the Jewish community of Winnipeg for generations to come."

Laurie Mainster's friendship with Peltz went back more than 60 years.

For the past 20 years, they've had a standing Friday lunch date. When Mainster called Peltz on Thursday, Dec. 22, Peltz said he wasn't feeling well. He had a sore throat, so they decided to cancel lunch for the next day.

Peltz passed away overnight in his sleep.

"The community has lost a special guy," Cowan said.

Kids supporting kids during the holiday season

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

In the spirit of giving back to the community, a fundraiser called Jake's Big Give gave families a chance to embrace a unique holiday adventure.

Some 2,500 people of all ages dropped into Toronto's former Kromer Radio building on Bathurst Street Nov. 24 and 25, which had been transformed into a kids' magical land. Upon arrival, the children were greeted by volunteer teenage angels, who escorted them to the Giving Store, which housed thousands of donated toys.

A $25 donation was the ticket price for all children, while adults entered free.

The twist to this fundraiser was that the kids selected their gift, wrapped it, made a personal card and donated it to a charity they chose themselves from among several that benefited from the event. They also received a "Jake's Buck," good for one toy for themselves.

"A winning formula aimed to teach children that the true gift is the one you give away," says Ellen Schwartz, co-founder of Jacob's Ladder and founder of Project Giveback.

"I am here with my kids to celebrate Jacob," said guest Jordan Banks. "This fundraiser is different than others, in that it is an incredibly homegrown and grassroots one, focusing on kids and making sure that all kids are taken care of in the holiday season. The possibilities of coming into a room like this, full of toys that you know will go to those less fortunate, leaves a profound mark on these children here today."

The real angel is 15-year-old Jacob Schwartz, who was diagnosed at four months of age with Canavan disease, an inherited, progressive, neurodegenerative condition. Jacob isn't able to walk, talk, move, see, breathe well or swallow, but he can hear, and he has a winning smile, with eyes that speak volumes.

Since it was formed in 1998, Jacob's Ladder Foundation has raised $2.5 million toward genetic and other kinds of research, and educating the general public. Jacob's Ladder offers free screening to test for seven genetic disorders that occur frequently in people of Ashkenazi Jewish descent. Unfortunately, there is neither treatment nor cure for Canavan disease.

"Funds raised at Jake's Big Give will go to the Jacob's Ladder Foundation for the Control of Neurodegenerative Diseases and the Jacob's Ladder therapeutic pool at the Jewish Community Centre's Lebovic campus," Schwartz said.

"Ellen and I are blown away with the community support," her husband, Jeff Schwartz, co-founder of Jacob's Ladder, added. "That's what it's all about: sharing both the good times and the not-so-good times with our community. So many of us get bent out of shape over the smallest things. Today is a day to remind us to keep perspective."

Jake's Big Give was presented by Fabricland and Scotiabank. There were 50 sponsors and hundreds of volunteers each day. Everything was donated. Families enjoyed free food and drink, a tattoo booth, a parents' lounge with live performances by inspiring kids. Wishing Well raffle tickets were sold, with the chance to win magnificent gift baskets.

Michael Back was the winner of the live auction for a pair of tickets in the eighth row at the 40-yard-line for the 100th Grey Cup.

"Sponsorship alone was already over $100,000 before even one ticket was sold. I predict we will net close to $200,000," Ellen Schwartz said.

"We want to teach our son how fortunate he is to have a mommy and daddy to buy him presents," said guest Danielle Conway. "And we want him to understand that not everybody can afford presents and all the comforts of life. By coming out to support Jake's Big Give, we are supporting Jacob as well as paying it forward. These lessons are invaluable."

Chanukah Food

A more adult-friendly Chanukah menu

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

At Chanukah, most traditional menus appear to be designed with children in mind.

Chanukah tables are loaded with platters of potato latkes, jam-filled doughnuts (sufganiyot) sprinkled with oodles of powdered sugar, fried fruit fritters drizzled with honey and bowls of chocolate gelt coins. Although our Chanukah menus seem child-centric, these dishes have their origins in our history. Chanukah foods are intended to remind us all of the events of Chanukah and of one of the most famous miracles of all: the oil that burned for eight days. From time to time, adults may seek a little bit more in a Chanukah menu.

Consider initiating a more grown-up menu that requires planning somewhat out of the box. Aim for a traditional style menu that includes less fried food, and continue by designing a menu with an imaginative twist. The following Chanukah for adults mixes the conventional with the unusual, while cutting back on some of the oil. So, by all means, go ahead and feed the kids "the usual" while the adults at your gathering enjoy a menu to remember.

SWEET AND SPICY TOSSED GREEN SALAD

6 cups mixed greens,
2 ripe pears, diced
4 tangerines or clementines, sectioned and seeded
2 tbsp. pine nuts, toasted
3/4 cups (1-inch) cubed fresh pineapple, about 4 oz.

2 tbsp. chopped fresh cilantro
2 tbsp. fresh orange juice
4 tsp. rice vinegar
1/2 tsp. chili sauce
1 large garlic clove
1/4 cup extra-virgin olive oil

Wash the greens and pat dry or dry in a salad spinner. Tear any large leaves into bite-size pieces. Place in a bowl and add the pear and tangerine sections.

To make the dressing, combine the pineapple, cilantro, orange juice, vinegar, chili sauce, and garlic in the processor or blender; process until smooth, gradually add olive oil until blended. Just before serving, shake the dressing and pour it over the salad.

Toss gently to mix. Garnish with the toasted pine nuts. Serve immediately. If you need to make the salad in advance, store the greens and fruit separately in covered containers in the refrigerator for up to 2 days. Toss with the dressing and garnish with the pine nuts just before serving.

CORNED BEEF LATKES

8 large potatoes, scrubbed
1/2 cup flour, all-purpose or unbleached
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1 tsp. baking powder
3 eggs, beaten
1 small onion, grated
12 oz. lean, deli corned beef, shredded or cut julienne style canola oil for frying

Scrub potatoes and remove any blemishes, leaving the skin on. Grate potatoes, in batches, using a food processor or with a hand grater. Place batches of the shredded potatoes in a colander and rinse well with cold water. Squeeze out water. Do this by hand, or by using a clean kitchen towel to wring out the excess water.

Place shredded potatoes in a large bowl. In a small bowl combine the flour, salt, pepper and baking powder. Mix it in with the potatoes. Add in the eggs, onion and shredded corned beef. Combine well.

Preheat oven to 300F to keep latkes warm after they are cooked. Prepare a baking sheet with some parchment paper.

In a large frying pan, heat about 1/2 inch of oil. It will be hot enough when a piece of shredded potato sizzles when put into the oil.

Form about 1/4 cup of the mixture into a patty, make 4-5 at a time, and place them into the hot oil. Leave about 1-1/2 inches between each latke. Use a spatula to flatten the latkes and cook about 5-7 minutes until golden brown. Use two spatulas to turn the latkes over. Continue to cook another 5-7 minutes.

Drain latkes on paper towels and place them on the baking sheet in the oven to keep them warm. Continue frying the remaining latkes, adding additional oil if needed.

'CRANAPPLE' SAUCE

1 package fresh cranberries or 1 package frozen cranberries
1 cup water
6 Honeycrisp apples, peeled, cored and diced sugar, 1/4 to 1/2 cup or to taste

Rinse cranberries in a strainer, pick out any berries that are soft or under ripe.

Boil the water in a medium-size pot, add cranberries and cover. Cook for about 10 minutes, stirring occasionally. Berries may pop. Add apples to pot and cook for an additional 10-15 minutes or until the apples are soft.

Corned beef latkes

For smooth sauce, process mixture using an immersion blender or in a processor. For chunky sauce, press with a potato masher to desired consistency.

Store in the refrigerator in a covered container.

PIQUANT MUSTARD COLESLAW

1 small cabbage
4 carrots
1 cup Calorie Wise Miracle Whip or similar salad dressing
1/4 cup yellow mustard
2 tbsp. white balsamic vinegar
1/4 cup sugar
1/2 tsp. black pepper

In a bowl, combine the salad dressing, mustard, vinegar, sugar and pepper. Remove core from the cabbage and grate it by hand or by using the slicing disk of the food processor. Grate carrots by hand or by using the grating disk of the food processor. Combine the cabbage and carrots in a large bowl. Toss the cabbage and carrots with the dressing until all the vegetables are covered. Chill for a minimum of 2 hours before serving.

Add some grains to your main course

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

Grains, grains and more grains. We keep hearing about the health benefits of grains – whole, ancient and otherwise – in our diets and how we should be eating more of them.

It's easy to incorporate more grains into your meal planning, especially when you make them an integral part of your main course. It rounds out whatever protein you opt to cook and it all comes to the plate in one fell swoop. The dishes created to highlight the simplicity of this approach are as perfect for weeknight meals as they are for entertaining.

That's the wonderful thing about grains. They've grown up, and are perfect for gussying up too. It's important to keep a few guidelines in mind, however. If you stock up on bulgur or quinoa, store whatever excess you may have in the freezer. They'll keep longer and fresher that way and can be measured and used without thawing. Toasting most grains before you cook them coaxes out more of their flavour and adds a pleasant nuttiness.

STEAMED FISH OVER QUINOA WITH CHARMOULA SAUCE

Charmoula, a spicy, piquant sauce from Morocco, is usually made with preserved lemons. If you happen to have some preserved lemons on hand, reduce the lemon juice in the following recipe to 2 tbsp. and replace the rind with 1 tbsp. of chopped preserved lemon.

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 leek cut in half lengthwise, rinsed and thinly sliced
1/2 lb. mushrooms, sliced
1/4 cup finely chopped shallots
1 cup finely diced sweet red pepper
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper
pinch cayenne
1 cup red or regular quinoa
2 cups water
4 filets firm fleshed white fish, i.e. snapper, tilapia (each about 6 oz.)

(Photo courtesy of Saffron Shores by Joyce Goldstein)

2 tbsp. lemon juice
Charmoula Sauce:
3 cloves garlic
1 tbsp. drained capers
1/2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. sweet paprika
1/2 tsp. each ground cumin and ground black pepper
pinch cayenne
1/4 cup lemon juice
1/4 cup each chopped fresh coriander and fresh parsley
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1/2 tsp. granulated sugar

To make the charroula sauce: Place garlic, capers and salt in mortar and pestle or bowl of small food processor; mash or pulse until paste is formed. Add paprika, cumin, pepper, cayenne and lemon juice and mash or pulse until well combined. Add coriander and parsley; mash or pulse until herbs are finely chopped and mixture is well combined. Stir in olive oil and sugar. (Charmoula sauce can be stored in an airtight container and refrigerated for up to 2 weeks. Stir to recombine).

Heat oil in large non-stick skillet set over medium-heat. Add leeks, mushrooms, shallots and red pepper; cook, stirring, for 5 minutes. Stir in salt, pepper and cayenne. Stir in quinoa. Pour in water. Lower heat and cook for 20 minutes or until almost all of the liquid has evaporated. Place fish on top and sprinkle with salt and pepper. Drizzle lemon juice over. Cover and steam for 8 to 10 minutes or until fish flakes easily with a fork.

Serve fish atop mound of quinoa. Dollop each serving with some charroula sauce. Makes 4 servings.

SPICY LEMON AND GINGER CORNISH HENS WITH CORIANDER COUSCOUS

Couscous:
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
4 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. finely minced fresh ginger
6 green onions, chopped
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper

2 cups couscous
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper
2-1/4 cups chicken stock
1/2 cup chopped fresh coriander
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
Cornish Hens:
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. finely minced fresh ginger
1/4 tsp. hot pepper flakes
1/2 cup chicken stock
1 tbsp. finely grated lemon rind
1/3 cup fresh lemon juice
1/4 cup dry sherry
2 tbsp. soy sauce
2 tbsp. honey
1 tsp. cornstarch

Couscous: Heat oil in saucepan set over medium heat. Add garlic, ginger and green onions; cook, stirring, for 2 minutes. Stir in couscous, salt and pepper. Pour in stock and bring to boil. Remove from heat. Cover and let stand for 5 minutes. Uncover pan and fluff couscous with fork. Stir in coriander and lemon juice. Set aside.

Cornish hens: Heat oil in clean saucepan set over medium heat. Add garlic, ginger and hot pepper flakes. Cook, stirring, for 30 seconds. Add chicken stock, lemon rind and juice, sherry, soy sauce and honey. Bring to boil. Dissolve cornstarch in 1 tablespoon of water. Whisk into lemon mixture. Boil, whisking constantly, until mixture is lightly thickened, 2 to 3 minutes. Remove from heat and let cool slightly.

Meanwhile, preheat oven to 375F. Cut wing tips from hens. Cut through both sides of backbone and remove. Cut through breastbone to divide hens in half.

Divide couscous into 8 equal mounds on large aluminum foil-lined baking sheet. Cover each mound with hen half, cut side down. Brush with cooled lemon glaze.

Bake hens in centre of preheated oven, for 45 to 50 minutes, brushing twice more with glaze, until juices run clear when thigh is pierced and meat thermometer registers 185F. Broil for 2 minutes to crisp skin. Using spatula, transfer hen and couscous to plate. Makes 8 servings.

Britain, France summon Israeli envoys

ITA

JERUSALEM — Britain and France have summoned their Israeli ambassadors to protest Israel's decision to authorize housing construction in the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem.

The ambassadors were summoned Monday amid reports that the two countries would recall their envoys in Israel for consultations.

Sweden has also summoned its Israel ambassador, according to reports.

"We deplore the recent Israeli government decision to build 3,000 new housing units and unfreeze development in the E1 block," the British Foreign Office said in a statement, threatening a "strong reaction" if construction goes ahead. "This threatens the viability of the two-state solution."

The E1 corridor, which connects Jerusalem to the large Ma'aleh Adumim settlement, is a piece of land that the Palestinians say is necessary to keep the borders of their state contiguous.

Unnamed European Union EU officials reportedly denied reports that the United Kingdom may cancel trade agreements with Israel, and France's Foreign Ministry said it would not recall its ambassador to Israel.

The EU officials are quoted as having told The Marker, an Israeli financial daily, on Monday that the U.K. has no independent trade agreements with Israel, and that its trade with Israel is anchored in the European Union's trade agreement with Israel. The U.K. has not made any request to change the EU's trade agreement, the officials added.

A statement by the French Embassy in Tel Aviv on Monday denied reports by Ha'aretz that France is considering recalling its Israeli ambassador due to Israel's announcement, a French Foreign Ministry spokesman said.

"France has other means to express its protest," the French Embassy in Tel Aviv wrote in a statement.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Sunday at the weekly cabinet meeting that Israel will continue to build in Jerusalem "and in all the places that are on the map of Israel's strategic interests."

The authorization for the housing plans reportedly was made by the nine-member security cabinet on the evening of Nov. 29 in the hours after the United Nations General Assembly approved enhanced observer statehood status for the Palestinians.

The approval has been condemned by the United States and the United Nations, in addition to other European countries.

The cabinet also decided on Sunday to officially reject the UN vote that upgraded the status of the Palestinians and said it would not transfer tax payments to the Palestinian Authority.

"The Jewish People have natural, historical, legal rights to its homeland with its eternal capital Jerusalem," the cabinet resolution said in part. "The State of Israel as the state of the Jewish People has rights and claims to areas that are under dispute in the Land of Israel."

The resolution also said that last week's vote by the UN General Assembly to grant the Palestinians non-member observer state status will not be used as the basis for future peace negotiations.

On Sunday, Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz also said he would not transfer tax payments collected by Israel on behalf of the Palestinian Authority as part of the punitive measures taken in the wake of the General Assembly vote. Instead, Steinitz said, he would use the money "to offset their debt to the Electric Corporation."

Happy Chanukah!

Why they stood with Israel

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — When the majority of nations voted last Thursday in favour of a resolution granting the Palestinians non-member observer state status at the United Nations General Assembly, it was widely seen as proof of Israel's international isolation — on the issue, at least.

Still, eight countries voted with Israel in the 138-vote diplomatic drubbing, while 41 abstained.

Who are these nations that dared to oppose China, France, Italy, Russia, Japan, Switzerland and 132 other nations? And why did they back the lost cause?

The United States and Canada are Israel's staunchest supporters in the international arena, so the no votes from the United States and Canada came as no surprise. But they were joined by Panama and the Czech Republic, as well as four countries most people would have difficulty finding on a map: the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia, Nauru and Palau.

These four remote island nations, combined, have a population of about 205,000. That's a bit less than the population of Petah Tikva. But in the UN General Assembly, every vote is equal, whether it belongs to China or to a 459-square-kilometre group of islands in the North Pacific Ocean, such as Palau.

The Marshall Islands, Micronesia, Nauru and Palau have a long history of voting similarly to the United States. In 2010, for example, Micronesia echoed Washington's vote at the UN 47 times and only contradicted it three times. Palau followed the U.S. lead in 96.5 per cent of all votes.

Some observers suggest that "checkbook diplomacy" is at work here, and that Israel or the United States bought the tiny island states' votes for cash. The Marshall Islands and Micronesia are states "in free association" with the United States and are set to receive $3.5 billion from Washington in the next 10 years, the International Business Times reported last week. "Palau is also in free association with the U.S., having received $18 million annually from the United States until 2009."

Checkbook diplomacy certainly exists. In 2008, Nauru received $10 million from Russia for voting in favour of the breakaway nation of Abkhazia, but Israeli officials denied checkbook diplomacy was at play during last Thursday's vote.

"We don't have money to pour on the other states for their votes," a diplomatic official told The Times of Israel on Sunday. Neither Jerusalem nor Washington put "a single cent or even half a cent on the table" in exchange for a pro-Israel vote, the official said.

It was actually the other side that bought pro-Palestine votes, this official claimed, hinting that "some Gulf states" paid for the support of "a few poor Pacific states and governments in Africa."

Guatemala, meanwhile, gave Israel a "solemn promise" to vote against the Palestinian resolution, but ended up abstaining, the official said.

Panama is consistently pro-Israeli and pro-American, he added. The Central American nation of 3.5 million is slightly smaller than South Carolina. The country's foreign ministry said, in a statement, that Palestine "first needs to settle the differences with its neighbour, the State of Israel, which, like Palestine, is entitled to a life in peace and harmonious coexistence with Palestine and other states in the region."

The Czech Republic's vote delighted and surprised Israeli officials. It was the only European country to vote against the Palestinian statehood bid. "They have been consistently one of our best friends in the EU," the official told The Times of Israel.

Berlin actually tried to pressure Prague to at least abstain in Thursday's vote, to present a more or less unified European position. "But they don't care what anyone else says. They're ballsy," the official said.

"We do not agree with any unilateral steps that may hamper or jeopardize the peace process leading to the two-state solution," the Czech Foreign Ministry said in a statement. Prague voted against the resolution "because we are afraid that it might result in a further delay in the resumption of the negotiating process."

The "no" votes were the more surprising given that even many of Israel's allies voted for the proposal, arguing that the Palestinians deserve a state and that this upgrade could re-energize the peace process.

The support of the Marshall Islands, Micronesia, Nauru and Palau did not come out of nowhere, said Michael Ronen, Israel's non-resident ambassador to 13 Pacific Islands, including the Marshall Islands and Micronesia, adding that he spent a lot of time lobbying before Thursday's vote.

Israel doesn't buy votes, but it does send aid to the Pacific. Medical and agricultural experts have travelled to the South Pacific from Israel, and in the 1990s an Israeli coach trained a Micronesian national team.

Bertha and Maria Marusia from Montreal Canada

Some 8 years ago I went to Belarus and created a documentary film. That film depicted my search of grandparents' the home in Vitebsk. This city was destroyed during the war and all its archives were burned. Miraculously survived in Vitebsk's Archive we found a document that shed some light regarding the house and family members who lived there. This document is also mentions the name of some Bertha (Basya) Voichansky (Voichansky). This document intrigued me to find out more about the family members and hence, I attempted to discover what happened to all the inhabitants of that house. I had previously heard about Bertha from my father, just shortly before he died, however he did not give me much relevant detail that could have assisted me further in my search. In my perception, Bertha should have been perished in the Holocaust with the rest of her family. Nevertheless, when I found our relatives in Russia in the year 2011, my Russian cousin confirmed to me that Bertha like Morris, Joseph, Sarah, Hannah Voichansky (Voichansky), and some other siblings immigrated to Canada and hence avoided the Holocaust persecution. Consequently, I learned some more confirming information from my second cousin (whom I just found recently in the USA) and his mother regarding Bertha who lived in Montreal Canada together with a picture of her and her daughter Maria-Marusia. Even though, through my Russian cousin I learned that my grandfather's sisters have also tried tracing our branch's fate during the Holocaust, sadly, I still do not know Bertha and Maria-Marussia names after marriage. Therefore, I really would like to find any information about Basya-Bertha and her daughter Maria-Marusia (and about any other siblings of this family).

If you have any such information or traces that could assist at this, please contact the undersigned.

Jewish woman reportedly brutally murdered in Iran

Ilan Ben Zion

The Times of Israel

ISFAHAN, Iran — A 57-year-old Jewish woman was brutally stabbed to death and her body mutilated on Nov. 26 by Muslim attackers in the Iranian city of Isfahan, in what her family says was a religiously motivated crime related to a property dispute, Menashe Amir, an expert on Iranian Jewry who spoke with the victim's family, told The Times of Israel.

Tuba N., whose family requested not to reveal her last name, was murdered by her Muslim neighbours, who had harassed her family for years in an attempt to drive them from their home and confiscate the property for the adjoining mosque.

"The religious radicals even expropriated part of the house and attached it to the mosque's courtyard," Amir said. "The Jewish family appealed to the courts with the help of a local attorney" to seek redress for the conflict, "despite the threats to their lives."

On Nov. 26, while her husband was in Tehran attending to business matters, "thugs broke into [Tuba N.'s] home, tied up her two sisters who were living with her, and repeatedly stabbed her to death." Afterward, her attackers allegedly butchered her body and cut off her hands, a sister who witnessed the event told her relatives in the United States, who conveyed the information to Amir.

Iranian authorities were said to have not returned the woman's dismembered body to her family and have tried to cover up the case.

The Times of Israel could not independently verify the report.

According to Amir, members of the dwindling community fear future bloodshed against Jews in the wake of Tuba N.'s murder.

Isfahan, Iran's third-largest city, with a population of more than 1.5 million, was home to 1,200 of Iran's 25,000 Jews as of 2009. Since then, Jewish numbers in the Islamic Republic have declined. A government census published earlier this year indicated there were a mere 8,756 Jews left in Iran, and Amir told The Times of Israel that Isfahan is now home to fewer than 100 families.

Hungarians protest Jobbik's antisemitism

ITA

BUDAPEST — Thousands demonstrated in front of the Hungarian Parliament building in Budapest to protest against the antisemitism of the far-right Jobbik party.

Leaders of Hungarian Jewish organizations, which organized the protest with other civic groups, were among the estimated 10,000 protesters in attendance on Sunday night.

Demonstrators carried signs that read: "I am not fascist, but Hungarian." "Jobbik is the biggest national security threat to Hungary" and "Racism is equal to Jobbik."

Some Holocaust survivors protested with a sign that read: "We already experienced this, and once was enough!"

Ilan Mor, the Israeli ambassador to Hungary, participated in the demonstration, as did the ambassadors from the United States and Sweden.

The demonstration comes in the wake of a call last week by Jobbik lawmaker Marton Gyongyosi to create a registry of Hungarian lawmakers and members of the Hungarian cabinet of Jewish origin.

Jobbik won 17 per cent of the votes in 2010 during the latest general elections. According to recent polls, some 21 per cent of the Hungarian population over age 15 are Jobbik sympathizers. Most supporters of Jobbik in Hungary are young or those belonging to the educated middle class.

The country's largest opposition party, the Hungarian Socialist Party, or MSZP, has called for a boycott of Jobbik. MSZP said it would boycott parliamentary sessions in which representatives of Jobbik are present and called on Hungarian Prime Minister Viktor Orban, head of the right-wing Fidesz Party, to condemn Gyongyosi's call for a Jewish registry of politicians at the start of the next parliamentary session.

Attila Mesterhazy said his opposition Socialist Party would boycott Parliament's foreign affairs committee as long as Gyongyosi remained its vice-chairman.

Jobbik president Gabor Vona, however, said the protest was part of an "artificially induced campaign of lies" meant to divert attention away from Hungary's economic problems and that the groups that took part in the rally wanted to "destroy" Jobbik.

Half a million Hungarian Jews were deported and killed in Auschwitz during the summer of 1944, and more than 100,000 Jews were killed in Hungary during the 1940s by Hungarian allies of the German Nazis.

Shul to be rebuilt

The Municipality of Jerusalem has announced plans to restore the historic Tiferet Yisrael Synagogue, located in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City. Originally dedicated in 1872, the shul was built as a place of prayer for the Old City's chassidic community. It became famous for its magnificent domed roof, which dominated the Old City's skyline. Jordanian forces destroyed the synagogue during the 1948 War of Independence. The nearby iconic Hurva synagogue, also destroyed in 1948, was rebuilt and rededicated in 2010.

U.S. plans military complex

The U.S. Army is preparing to supervise construction of an underground military complex near Tel Aviv. The five-storey complex, dubbed "Site 911," is expected to take more than two years to build and will cost up to $100 million, the Washington Post reported. It will be located inside an Israeli Air Force base. The construction of the facility, to be supervised by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, appears to be one of the largest projects undertaken by the Corps in Israel.

Likud shifts right

Members of the Likud Party voted out moderate party stalwarts and elected more right-wing candidates to fill the realistic spots on its Knesset list. Current ministers Dan Meridor and Benny Begin, considered party moderates, did not make the top 20 on the party list, places that will likely be seated in the next government. Because of the agreement between Likud and Yisrael Beiteinu, every two Likud names on the list will be followed by a Yisrael Beiteinu name. Moshe Feiglin, a right-winger who challenged Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for the Likud leadership, placed 15th.

Two leaders of Israel's social protest movement, Stav Shapir and Itzik Shmoli, made it into the top 12 slots on the Labor Party's list for the upcoming election. Party chairwoman Shelly Yachimovich, a former hard-hitting radio interviewer whose tough talk on social inequality has spurred a revival of the party, is the first name on the slot. Isaac Herzog got the second slot, followed by party veterans Amir Peretz, Eitan Cabel and Ha'aretz columnist Merav Michael.

Livni forms new party

Tzipi Livni, the former opposition leader, has re-entered politics as head of a new centre-left party. Livni, ex-head of the Kadima Party, said last week she would lead a new party called Hatnua, or the Movement. In forming her own party, she turned down offers to join the leadership of two existing parties. Yair Lapid, head of the new Yesh Atid party, said he had offered Livni to be his No. 2 and to be a "full partner in all major decisions." He also urged Livni not to further split the centrist vote. Labor leader Shelly Yachimovich also wanted Livni for her party.

Long haul to lift restraining order

Family Matters

by John Syrtash

B.A. (Hon), LL.B.
Counsel

Garfin Zeidenberg LLP Family Lawyer & Mediator for 31 years

Question. My cousin is going through a tough separation. His wife had a restraining order put against him and he is afraid to pick up his kids. He meets them near their school. Now his wife would like to reconcile. How does she go about lifting the restraining order? She claims she did not put this against him in the first place.

She had gone to the police station and wanted him removed from their house so she could go back and leave to go to her mother's house with the kids. The police came and removed him.

My question is, how does this restraining order work? Can the police put a restraining order against your spouse? Can the spouse do it? How can it be reversed?

Answer: Here are the steps.

1. Wife goes to the police and files a claim of domestic violence;
2. If the police investigate and are of the view that a charge of domestic violence is warranted based on the information available to them at that time, the police (not the wife) may lay the charges and arrest the accused. He receives a hearing at which the wife is only a witness (unless the accused pleads guilty, in which case there is no "trial", since the offence is technically against the public, not against the wife. The member of the public just happens to be the wife).
3. Prior to a trial or after a possible conviction, the Court imposes conditions on his movements as a term of not being imprisoned, which may restrain him from communication with his wife or even coming within so many feet of her residence or place of work, which only a Crown Prosecutor can ask a Judge to remove.
4. If the wife intends to reconcile, she then usually approaches a Crown Prosecutor, often with the assistance of a criminal lawyer, not a family law lawyer, although some lawyers practice both areas of the law.

5. The Crown prosecutor may or may not agree. It is not at all automatic. However, a competent criminal lawyer will explain that these conditions may be interfering with the reconciliation of the spouses.
6. If the Crown prosecutor agrees, there is another hearing, often with the wife as a witness. The wife may attempt to explain that she no longer fears her husband and wishes to reconcile with him or that the original occurrence of which she complained was a misunderstanding. Then, depending upon the circumstances leading to the arrest given the evidence of the arresting officer and the individual approach of the particular Judge, the conditions may be lifted.

This is a particularly difficult area since prosecutors, peace officers and the Courts are wary of women who often feel economically and psychologically vulnerable after an assault and are then approached by third parties to "drop the charges" after husbands or partners plead that their repeated acts of violence will suddenly end. Often Justice Officials and lawyers are caught in a revolving door with such victims and their perpetrators. There are no easy answers and each case must be carefully and compassionately.

If the violent relationship has been overwhelming and of the revolving door variety, and the fellow presents a continuing danger, either the prosecutor or the Judge may not agree to lift the restraining order, particularly if children may become the next victims or witnesses.

The agony felt by such abused women who go back to abuse is beyond anyone's imagining. It gives new meaning to the term "vicious cycle."

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a Happy and Healthy Chanukah.

SDE BOKER, Israel — Israeli and Zionist history is viewed as objectively as possible at Ben-Gurion University's (BGU) Research Institute for the Study of Israel and Zionism.

There are no rose-coloured glasses to be seen or peered through, says Ofer Shiff, a senior lecturer at the institute.

This level of research study requires an exacting degree of scholarly detachment, said Shiff, who until last year headed BGU's Israel studies program.

Yet there is no getting around the fact that when the vast majority of the teachers and students of Israel and Zionism are Jewish, there's a risk that scholarly detachment can only go so far, he said.

"This is a holistic story we are trying to tell," Shiff told a group of media representatives visiting BGU recently. "There are many converging and diverging narratives, and we must look at them all."

"We see ourselves responsible for how we tell our own story."

That sentiment was echoed by Nathan Aridan, a historian at the research institute who is managing editor of the English-language Israel Studies.

"This is our laboratory," said Aridan. "This is where our students get to understand the discourse."

At the very core of the research are the David Ben-Gurion Archives, housed at the institute on BGU's Sde Boker campus. David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, lived in Sde Boker. His glasses are still perched on the desk at his humble kibbutz home, which is now a museum.

Ben-Gurion kept detailed memoirs as well as virtually all ephemera related to every aspect of the founding and creation of the Jewish state. His papers are a treasure-trove for academics, historians, archivists and scholars.

"As if he knew what we would be looking at some day," Shiff said.

Shiff and Aridan brought along a replica of a binder of Ben-Gurion's, which included the yellowing paper where he jotted down not only his thoughts of the day, but also, on the side of his ledger, a list of yishuvim that had been established that day.

Since 2011-12, the BGU institute's Israel studies program has offered an English-language component that enables international students, for the first time, to earn a master's degree in Israel studies Hebrew speakers have been able to do since 2005. The overall institute dates back to 1976.

According to the institute's website, the program covers more than a century of Zionism, integrating historical and contemporary perspectives, and focuses on the emergence of Zionist ideology, and the building of the Yishuv and the State of Israel.

"The content of the program is based on the assumption that the field of Israel studies is inextricably connected to the fields of modern Jewish history and Middle Eastern studies," the website states.

"The program's approach is multi-disciplinary, with a historical emphasis."

Both inside and outside Israel, Israel studies is thriving at several other institutions, especially in the United States, but also in Canada, at Montreal's Concordia University and the University of Calgary. The University of Toronto has an Andrea and Charles Bronfman Chair in Israeli Studies.

But for Shiff and Aridan, nothing quite compares to studying Israel and Zionism at the place where the "old man," Ben-Gurion, lived and died — at BGU-Sde Boker, where the Jewish state's most precious records are kept.

"The archives touch us right here at home. Every day we touch history," Shiff said.

David Lazarus took part in the media mission as a guest of BGU.

Longtime friends in business together for long time

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The practice of social work is associated with helping families, seniors, children and other people at risk, not necessarily with helping women find the right undergarment.

Likewise for psychometrics, the theory and technique of psychological measurement.

Yet in the case of two Toronto women, careers in those fields merged rather seamlessly into one selling and fitting ladies with the proper "underpinnings" – as in bras, "shape wear" (what used to be called girdles, leggings and other lingerie items).

Thirty years ago, Rhonda Finkelstein and Randi Szymkowicz left behind their careers in the helping professions to found another sort of helping business: Legs Plus and Bra Boutique, a small-scale shop catering to the needs of female customers.

Located in the "Pickle Barrel plaza" on Leslie Street south of Cummer Avenue, the business boasts a loyal clientele that travel from far and wide to be fitted by the ladies at Legs Plus.

"We pride ourselves on our personal service," said Finkelstein.

In fact, it's the care and attention to their customers that Finkelstein believes has powered the business for 30 years.

As a smallish business, Legs Plus can't compete with the big box stores on price, she acknowledged. Yet her clients are largely repeat customers, and women travel from around the province – they even have a regular who drives up from Buffalo – to be fitted at the store.

"It's the way we attack the situation," said Finkelstein. "It's approached in a way that's casual, easy and comfortable."

"We have some things that big box stores and other lingerie boutiques have, but it's the service and how we present ourselves to our customers" that distinguishes Legs Plus, she said.

"It's a warm atmosphere."

Much of that comes from their background in the helping professions, but some of it is a result of their experience working in retail when they were younger.

Finkelstein believes the personal touch that she, Szymkowicz and their staff present makes all the difference.

Randi Szymkowicz, left, and Rhonda Finkelstein of Legs Plus and Bra Boutique have spent the last 30 years helping Toronto-area women discover well-fitted underpinnings.

"I've been fitting bras for well over 30 years," said Finkelstein. "I love being with customers."

The customers appreciate the hands-on service, as well as undergarments that hold up over time. Plus, having the right underwear make women feel good about themselves, Finkelstein said.

"The bra is one of the first things to go on in the morning and the last to come off at night. It needs to be comfortable. Women need support... If you're not comfortable, you're not happy. We try to make women as comfortable as we can with the tools available to us."

"It's women helping other women with an undergarment," said Szymkowicz. "If they feel good about the undergarment they're wearing on the inside, they will feel good about themselves on the outside."

Given its 30-year track record, it's clear the business offers customers something of value. Finkelstein and Szymkowicz are now fitting the daughters of previous customers.

The business remains profitable, although as a privately held company, Finkelstein and Szymkowicz won't reveal exact figures.

Merchandise can range in price from a bare-bones bra that sells for $40 to a $190 model "with all the bells and whistles" – better quality, longevity and more attention to details, said Szymkowicz.

Since opening in 1982, they've noticed some changes in the sector. More of their merchandise is assemble abroad than before: there are some products, such as sports bras, that have become more popular, and sizes are going up, up, up.

D cups have given way to a whole range of sizes, up to and including L cups. "We're dealing with big women who need help," Finkelstein said.

Another thing that's expanding is the company. "The business is growing and continues to grow, particularly after expanding to the main level eight years ago," said Szymkowicz.

That move saw the business go from a 500-square-foot space on the second floor of the plaza to a 2,000-square-foot location one flight down.

Being on street level exposed them to more walk-in traffic and allowed them to carry more merchandise.

They share the current premises with another, complementary business, Beachwear Unlimited, a bathing suit boutique. Not coincidentally, it's owned by their mothers, Marilyn Snider and Elly Sherman.

In fact, said Finkelstein, retail runs in both their families.

Her grandfather, an immigrant, was a furrier, while Szymkowicz's grandfather owned a ladies' clothing store.

The families have been friends for generations.

Both women have grown children, but Finkelstein isn't ready to pass the reins just yet. "I love it. It's what I do," she said.

Israel's arsenal said to include electromagnetic bomb

The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Israel could destroy Iran's electrical network with a specially designed electromagnetic bomb in the event of a military conflict between the countries, Britain's Sunday Times newspaper reported recently.

An electromagnetic bomb of this sort would be detonated above the ground, creating an electromagnetic pulse that would "disrupt all the technological devices working on the ground," a U.S. expert was quoted as saying to the London paper.

The use of the new technology by Israel was brought up in discussions regarding a possible attack on Tehran's nuclear facilities, the report claimed. Such a move would send Iran "back to the stone age," the Times reported.

This kind of bomb would operate based on the nonlethal technology of gamma rays, the report explained. The outburst of energy would "fry" electric devices and currents around the source of the explosion.

Bernard Lucht – king of current affairs shows at CBC

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Bernard (Bernie) Lucht works quietly behind the scenes at CBC Radio, offering listeners thought-provoking current affairs programs that clarify the issues of the day and delve into topics, past and present, that otherwise might be ignored or downplayed by competing broadcasters.

Until recently, Lucht was an executive producer in charge of Ideas, the Massey Lectures, the Dalton Camp Lecture in Journalism and Tapestry, all of which explore subjects like politics, history, science, philosophy and religion in uncommon depth.

Two months ago, in what he describes as a lateral shift, he was handed a new job as executive producer of Network Talk Partnerships, which is responsible for the crème de la crème of CBC's current affairs and talk shows: The Current, Ideas, As It Happens, Q, The Debaters and Writers and Company.

"It's an expansion of the work I've been doing already," explained Lucht, who joined the CBC as a summer intern/researcher in 1964.

As executive producer of Ideas, he developed partnerships with external bodies ranging from the Massey Lectures to the Dalton Camp Lecture in Journalism, both of which are delivered by an eclectic range of politicians, scholars, academics, authors and journalists.

In truth, he expected to finish his career there. But last summer, the powers-that-be asked him to develop yet more partnerships.

Lucht will nonetheless continue to produce such programs as Writers and Company and Wachtel on the Arts.

Lucht, whose successor at Ideas is the former executive producer of The Current, Pam Bertrand, has begun sifting through new possibilities for future partnerships. But if his long career at Ideas is any indicator of where he may go in the future, a shakeup should be expected in the months and years ahead.

At Ideas, Lucht fine-tuned an adult education show that had become a tad too esoteric and even stodgy.

"My mandate was to make Ideas more accessible," he said in an interview. "I moved it into a more feature journalistic mode. I combined stories with ideas, which is what a magazine like The New Yorker does."

He added, "We speeded it up. The old shows were slower in pace. We had to figure out a way to make it more compelling. We absorbed the rhythms and tastes in evolving culture."

Thanks to these incremental changes, Ideas managed to increase its audience share. Today, it reaches an average of 720,000 listeners per week – not bad for a program whose objective is to induce listeners to say, "I didn't know that," or "I didn't think of it like that."

In retrospect, Lucht's agenda at Ideas was nothing if not challenging.

"I tried to produce insightful shows that provided a broad view of the world, contemporary society and great thinkers. I looked at culture and ideas, which are discussable and debatable and around which our lives are based. The job of Ideas is to locate ourselves in the universe, as [broadcaster] Lister Sinclair said."

Most recently, Ideas has explored Inuit oral legends, the concept of morality, the role of imagination, the failed state of Somalia, Mayan civilization, the War of 1812, the city of Sarajevo, the Titanic shipwreck, the idea of genius, the politics of saint making and the fearsome reputation of snakes.

Over the decades, Lucht was involved in the production of more than 3,000 Ideas shows, of which he personally produced several hundred.

He has no favourites. "It's like choosing your favourite child," said Lucht, a father of three whose wife, Susan, was once a CBC production assistant. "I was proud to produce all of them."

Each episode presented certain challenges, he said as he leaned back on a chair in his dim, windowless office in downtown Toronto.

"A show that feels easy to produce isn't as good as one you've struggled with. The hard ones give off energy."

As far as he can recall, he never touched the perennially sensitive Arab-Israeli conflict because a colleague, Michael Enright, covered it so comprehensively. "There was no way of matching him," he noted.

But he did turn out shows on Jewish composers during the Holocaust, the Theresienstadt concentration camp and biblical archeology.

Lucht, 68, was born and raised in a Montreal neighbourhood close to Mount Royal he refers to as "Mordecai Richler country."

His father, Karl, who died when he was young, was a machinist and a restaurateur. His mother, Helen Rosenberg, was a housewife and a bookkeeper by trade. Lucht's younger brother, Marty, is a tax accountant in Montreal.

After graduating from the High School of Montreal, he attended Sir George Williams University (now Concordia), majoring in political science and history.

While studying, he landed his first broadcasting position as a researcher on The Observer, a supper hour public affairs program co-hosted by Lloyd Robertson, who would become CTV's news anchor. For Lucht, having been bitten by the broadcasting bug at the age of 16, it was a dream come true.

Thinking he might become an academic, he started post-graduate studies at McGill University. But having grown weary of it, he packed his bags and went to Nigeria, where he taught history at a boys' college and economics to government employees.

Upon returning to Canada about two years later, he snagged a production assistant's position at Ideas, which was launched in 1965. Lucht was not new to the CBC. In 1968 and 1969, he was a producer at Cross-Country Checkup.

The first assignment he was handed at Ideas was converting six reels of Massey Lectures into half-hour segments. They were on the power of the law by political scientist J.A. Corry.

"Corry was a slow talker. I sped up the pace of his talk by cutting out his long pauses. One of his students told me, 'Nice lecture, but I never heard him speak so fast.'"

Lucht was promoted to producer in 1972, and in 1984, he was named executive producer. As a producer, he focused exclusively on episodes he had developed, but as an executive producer, he oversaw the entire series.

Although he is working on new projects these days, Lucht will probably always be associated with Ideas.

"It was a privilege to work on Ideas," he said. "It's so intellectually stimulating. It suited my temperament and curiosity."

PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT?

For those waiting for the last minute to do effective, year-end tax planning, this is the last minute!

What are you waiting for? Better late than not at all!

Those born in 1941 must convert their Registered Funds to a RRIF or LIF before the end of the year.

If you still have contribution room and do not have a younger spouse, now will be the last time to make further contributions for deductions this year! You can even pre-pay contributions for future years if you will continue to have earned income! There are new rules regarding the Pension Income Credit and Income Splitting that could save you taxes, but you must act now to create qualifying income before the end of this year!

Maximize your income while minimizing taxes for RRIFs and LIFs.

There are also very successful strategies for small business owners.

PLAYWRIGHT HANNAH MOSCOVITCH EXAMINES CANADA'S ENGAGEMENT IN AFGHANISTAN IN THIS IS WAR

Acclaimed Tarragon playwright-in-residence Hannah Moscovitch has written This Is War, a play slated to open at Tarragon's Extra Space on Jan. 3.

The play focuses on the Canadian Forces in a volatile region of Afghanistan in 2008 and presents the perspectives of three soldiers and a medic as interviewed by an unseen journalist. The cast features Lisa Berry, Ari Cohen, Sergio Di Zio and Ian Lake.

Moscovitch, who Tarragon describes as "the country's most produced young playwright," is one of the writers of the CBC radio drama Afghanistan. Her previous staged plays include East of Berlin, The Children's Republic and The Russian Play.

Born in Ottawa of a Romanian-Ukrainian-Jewish father and Irish-Catholic mother, she went to theatre school and began writing plays after studying literature at the University of Toronto. She has won numerous Dora Mavor Moore Awards and has been nominated for the Governor General's Award and other prizes.

This Is War is on stage at Tarragon Theatre Extra Space, 30 Bridgman Ave., Jan. 3 to Feb. 3, with previews beginning Dec. 28. $53 to $27. 416-531-1827, www.tarragontheatre.com

Rabbi Sam: Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre presents Rabbi Sam, a one-man comedy by San Francisco performer Charlie Varon, about a rabbi who wants to reinvent American Judaism, beginning with the congregation that hired him: some people love him, some can't stand him. "Funny, moving, bursting with energy and ideas. Rabbi Sam is a play for Jews, gentiles and anyone who has ever attended a meeting."

Directed by Ari Weisberg, Toronto Centre for the Arts, Studio Theatre, 5040 Yonge St. Jan. 3 to 13, 2013. $48 to $19. 416-781-5527, www.teatrontheatre.com

Stevie Wonder pulls out of IDF fundraiser

Stevie Wonder pulled out of a performance fundraiser for the Israel Defence Forces, a source said.

Wonder's representatives said that he does not know the nature of the group, the Friends of the Defense Forces, and that he believes such a performance would be incongruous with his status as "Messenger of Peace," according to a source who read email exchanges between Wonder's representatives and organizers of the event.

Wonder was scheduled to headline the Friends of the Israeli Defence Forces annual gala in London on Dec. 6. The event raises millions of dollars to support the Israeli military.

The head of the Friends of the IDF Maj.-Gen. Gershon expressed his regret that the Grammy singer withdrew.

Wonder had come under intense social pressure to pull out of the event. An online petition calling on him to cancel his performance gathered more than 3,600 signatures.

The petition was launched more than a day on the change.org website.

Wonder performed at a 1998 gala honoring the 50th anniversary.

was born in Ohio to an Israeli mother and father. His parents moved the family to Israel as five.

his Israel Defence Forces service, he injured at 22, he moved back to the United States.

ard, Lemish began practising Asian healing ding tai chi and yoga, and the meditative art g, to help with pain management, flexibility and calming of the mind.

So how did he become the host for Shen Yun?

"In 2005, I was in Los Angeles studying Chinese when an earlier incarnation of [Shen Yun], run by a local Chinese TV station, was running. I was friends with one of the ladies running the operation, and she asked me to emcee it," he said.

The experience of hosting that show in front of a predominantly Chinese audience was exhilarating, he said.

A year later, the company played on Broadway for New York's Chinese community and invited him to host the performance once again, this time for their new Shen Yun organization, and he's been with the troupe ever since. But the cultural fascination goes both ways.

Lemish said his Shen Yun co-workers are curious about his Jewish and Israeli background.

"There's a mutual fascination between the cultures. There's a great history and tradition on both sides. And [Shen Yun staff] love asking about Judaism and Israel. We get into these elaborate conversations.

"There's a lot of questions, ranging from 'Why the yarmulke?' to 'What is it about Jerusalem?' and 'I don't understand a thing about Moses,'" Lemish said.

He added that the troupe hopes to tour Israel in the near future.

Lemish describes his role with Shen Yun as "a cultural bridge."

He said that because the performance is so steeped in Chinese culture, which is foreign to many people, there's a need to translate and prepare audiences before and after each act.

Lemish estimates he appears on stage about 20 times a performance to tell the audience what the next chapter in each show is about.

"The show revolves around 5,000 years of Chinese civilization and spans the history, legends and fairy tales through that time up to present day," he said.

"It's geared towards a broad audience. But Chinese audience members are [now] a minority in the crowd, maybe 20 per cent. Most of the dancers and performers are Chinese, many of whom are from Toronto."

Ironically, in 2001 Lemish was banned from travel to China by the Chinese government after being arrested and then deported from the country following his participation in a Tiananmen Square protest against repression of the Falun Gong movement.

In a Dec. 27, 2007, report in the Jewish Journal, he said while he was sad he was prevented from visiting the country he cared "very deeply about and have spent lots of time learning about," he also did not regret his actions.

"I grew up learning about the Holocaust," he told the Journal. "No one stood up for my ancestors, but we've learned something from that experience. [The repression of] Falun Gong and the Holocaust are not the same, but they're similar atrocities. I felt a historical burden to stand up and do something."

Members of Shen Yun perform

Shen Yun is also prohibited from playing in the Communist country.

China is the only country in the world where it's not allowed to perform, according to Shen Yun.

"Many of the performers are blacklisted in [China]. A couple of years ago, for example, my emcee partner's father back in China was very ill. But she couldn't go back to China to see him, and he passed away," Lemish said.

"Some performers' families back in China regularly receive 'visits' from state security – the point is to pressure the family members to convince the artist to stop performing."

He said it's heartbreaking for the performers to be denied entry to their country.

"This is what they work so hard and endure all the pain for – their dream is to bring this lost culture back to its homeland," Lemish said.

He added that Chinese tourists plan trips to locations where Shen Yun is scheduled to perform.

"Those Chinese who can afford it are flying to other cities in Asia and places like Vancouver and Los Angeles to see us perform," he said.

Still, those in the Chinese diaspora and non-Chinese audiences alike are interested in Shen Yun's representation of Chinese historical, cultural and spiritual artistry.

Local audiences are in for a treat if the videos posted to Shen Yun's website are any indication of what will be presented at their shows.

It features hundreds of performers conveying traditional Chinese stories to western audiences through dance. The performances are exquisitely choreographed, the costumes are vibrant, and the scores are majestic.

Musician brings Hebrew prayer songs to the masses

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Aviva Chernick is hoping her devotional music will change people's perception of Jewish culture.

It's so important to make positive Jewish voices heard outside of the community, she says. "Then, we're not known as the 'other.' We're not known as a picture in a newspaper story about violence or some sort of stereotype."

Right now, Torontonians have become comfortable with Jewish culture in the forms of Woody Allen and klezmer music, she says, but there is much less understanding of the religious aspects of Judaism.

"To come out with something different from that has felt like it takes a certain kind of courage," she says.

The cantorial soloist, who performs at various synagogues in Toronto both as part of religious services and for entertainment, says there is a movement in Canada to encourage the Jewish creative voice.

"We have a very distinctive voice from the American Jewish community, and right now it doesn't seem that way," she says, explaining that her musician friends in New York are surrounded by Jews, especially in comparison to the Toronto scene.

"My experience as a Jewish artist in Canada, it takes a lot of courage to speak from a place of Jewish identity."

Chernick released one album in the past with Juno-nominated band Iaffa Road, and she later recorded an album of cover songs. Now she's releasing her first original solo album. When I Arrived You Were Already There.

She says she hopes listeners will interpret the album title and find their own meanings, but to her, the title has to do with a long search for connection and at the end of that journey, realizing that connection was always there.

"I always owned it. It was dwelling within. I just didn't know how to access it," she says.

Specifically, the title has to do with meeting the "beloved," which is one of the words she uses for God.

"I'm not really moved by the word God. It's not a very luscious word," she says. "I think it's because 'the divine' and 'beloved' speak of creating and loving, and God is a three-letter word that doesn't ring to me. It's not very juicy."

Chernick says she hopes the fact that her music is being played on the radio means people outside of the Jewish community will see it represented creatively, lovingly and in a positive light.

"We don't have a lot of contemporary Jewish voices coming out of the city, writing original music for prayer that is heard outside of the Jewish community," she says.

She is hesitant to call her music religious, preferring the term "devotional." Part of the aim of her work is to simply be good quality music – "beautiful, simple melodies with elegant harmonic structures and virtuosic musicianship."

However, religion is certainly at the heart of her songs.

"The other focus, or the other intention, is for it to be music that helps one connect more deeply to the divine," she says, speaking slowly and choosing her words carefully.

"People might meditate to it. They might sing along, they might teach it to each other in community, and hopefully in the end, both intentions come together to make it moving and meaningful music," she says.

Most of the lyrics come from the Book of Psalms, and eight of the nine tracks on the new album are originals.

Along with the traditional instruments found in western music – guitar, bass, drums – her album features uncommon sounds from instruments like a tabla, udu, xaphoon, oud, djembe and bansuri.

This is fairly common in world music, which she says is the only genre where her music fits. It's meant to create a multicultural sound.

"We create a kind of music that sounds you're not quite sure where it's from," she says. "I imagine it to be music of right now, and it really reflects a Canadian Jewish identity."

Chernick says the community has been very supportive of her work, but there's still more to be done in order to be heard outside the community, especially to those who have never met a Jew.

She acknowledges that her music doesn't necessarily have mainstream appeal, calling it not "the hippest" music, but that's fine.

"I'm prepared for that. I think I'm learning that we have to be very brave in the way we have here, and to really raise our voices," she says. "We don't do anybody a service by keeping quiet."

U.S., Iran remain on collision course, book suggests

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Iran has been an enduring constant in U.S. foreign policy since the fall of the Iranian monarchy and its replacement by an Islamic fundamentalist regime three decades ago.

Once a key American ally in the Middle East, Iran is now a staunch and unflinching adversary.

The adversarial relationship between the United States and Iran is the subject of David Crist's illuminating book, The Twilight War: The Secret History of America's Thirty-Year Conflict with Iran (The Penguin Press).

At a time when tensions in the Middle East are rising, due in part to Iran's nuclear ambitions and its strategic alignment with Hezbollah, Hamas and the embattled government of President Bashar Assad of Syria, this volume is particularly topical.

Forty years ago, Iran was regarded by Washington as a reliable partner, a proxy in the battle to contain the Soviet Union. But with the downfall of Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, the shah of Iran, the United States suddenly found itself facing a new, uncertain future.

The first tangible sign that the status quo had been rendered obsolete was the takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran in 1979. The Iranian foreign minister, a moderate, wanted to end the standoff, but Iran's radical spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, disagreed. To Khomeini, the takeover was a golden opportunity to consolidate his power and rally the public behind the Islamists at the expense of liberals and nationalists in the revolutionary coalition, suggests Crist.

The seizure of the American Embassy was clearly a turning point in the United States' bilateral relations with Iran, prompting the U.S. president, Jimmy Carter, to sever diplomatic ties with Tehran and enunciate the Carter Doctrine, which stated that the Persian Gulf area, with its vast reserves of oil, was vital to U.S. national interests and therefore worth defending. From that point onward, as Crist observes, the United States plotted to overthrow the hostile Iranian regime.

To no one's surprise, Iranian leaders accused the United States of complicity in Iraq's invasion of Iran in 1980.

But as Crist correctly points out, Iraq's aggression proved to be a godsend to Iran. Iranians rallied around the Islamic regime, diverting attention away from Iran's slide into tyranny. (Israel should take this factor into account before launching a pre-emptive strike on Iran in a bid to disable or destroy its ominously-developing nuclear program).

The paranoia touched off in Iran by Iraq's invasion was, in fact, well-founded. The United States, regarding Iraq as the lesser of two evils, tilted against Iran and began supplying Saddam Hussein's dictatorship with financial, intelligence and arms assistance, even though it was officially neutral in the Iran-Iraq War.

Some American officials, notably Paul Wolfowitz in the State Department and Richard Perle in the Defence Department, opposed the pro-Iraqi tilt, arguing in vain that Baghdad posed a greater danger to U.S. interests. Iran's growing role in Lebanon, following Israel's ill-conceived invasion in 1982, did not escape the attention of the United States. With Iranian diplomats and agents assiduously cultivating the Shiite community, Iran's influence increased significantly, thereby changing the balance of power in Lebanon, much to the detriment of Sunni Muslims and Maronite Christians.

Under the presidency of Ronald Reagan, U.S. policy on Iran shifted. Reagan's national security adviser, Bud McFarlane, called for détente rather than containment, a policy that culminated with the Iran-Contra scandal.

As Crist succinctly explains, the scandal was fuelled by two separate but interlocking issues – the Reagan administration's decision to funnel weapons to both pro-American guerrillas in Nicaragua's civil war and the Islamic regime in Iran. By supplying Iran with military equipment, a venture in which Israel was deeply involved, the United States hoped to achieve two objectives: win the release of American hostages held by Hezbollah in Lebanon and renew relations with Tehran.

Reagan's successor, George H. W. Bush, was also interested in striking up a rapprochement with Iran, believing Iran could serve as a buffer against Iraq and the Soviet Union. Iran, weakened by the nine-year war with Iraq, encouraged the Americans, but mutual suspicions remained.

During the 1991 Gulf War, when Iraq was perceived as the enemy in Washington, the United States maintained regular though indirect contact with Iran through Swiss intermediaries.

With Iraq's defeat in that war, Iran approached the United States with a startling proposal, suggesting that the four basic issues that divided them – terrorism, the Arab-Israeli dispute, weapons of mass destruction and human rights – should be examined by a joint working group. The Americans, however, were not interested, says Crist.

The election of Mohammad Khatami as Iranian president in 1997 encouraged the United States to develop a policy of engagement with Iran, but it never gained traction. In 2002, in a dramatic break with that policy, president George W. Bush singled out Iran, Iraq and North Korea as constituting "an axis of evil."

Stepping back from the brink of an armed confrontation with Iran, the United States announced it was prepared to normalize relations with Tehran if it scrapped its nuclear and ballistic missile programs, supported an Arab-Israeli peace process and ended its support of U.S.-designated terrorist organizations Hezbollah and Hamas. This initiative, too, came to naught.

On May 4, 2003, a Swiss diplomat delivered an astounding two-page fax to the U.S. State Department calling for a resolution of Iranian-American enmity. Iran agreed to full transparency with respect to its nuclear program and agreed to halt its support of Hamas and take steps that would result in the demilitarization of Hezbollah.

In exchange, Iran wanted the United States to stop trying to change its political system, recognize Iran's "legitimate security interests" in the Mideast and issue a statement decoupling Iran from the "axis of evil."

Condoleezza Rice, the U.S. secretary of state, dismissed the offer on behalf of the Bush administration, but three years later, she publicly proclaimed that a normalization of relations would be possible if Iran suspended all uranium enrichment. The Iranian government rejected the proposal, with the upshot that the United States convinced the United Nations to impose economic sanctions on Iran.

In his memoirs, Bush wrote, "I regret that I ended my presidency with the Iranian issue unresolved." Recognizing that Iran would be one of his prime security challenges, the current American president, Barack Obama, began his term of office in 2009 with a call for dialogue with the Iranian regime. Iran did not respond in kind, prompting Obama to say, "Faced with an extended hand, Iran's leaders have shown only a clenched fist." Not surprisingly, the Iranians reacted coolly to Obama's reelection, accusing him of having imposed "unprecedented sanctions" on Iran.

Last month, in a further sign that not all is well between the United States and Iran, Iranian aircraft fired shots at an American surveillance drone flying in international airspace, in the first such incident of its kind.

More than 30 years after breaking formal relations with Tehran, the United States and Iran remain on a dangerous collision course.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Fichman ends 2012 with higher ranking

Marvin Glassman
Special to the CJN

It's been nine years since Sharon Fichman of Toronto was touted as Canada's biggest tennis star since Carling Bassett.

Fichman won the prestigious Orange Bowl junior title in 2003 at age 13, but has since not lived up to the lofty expectations that many had for her. After turning pro in 2007, Fichman has struggled to win on the minor league Challenger pro tennis circuit.

But Fichman has established a level of consistency in 2012, winning two tournaments to go along with five runner-up finishes and two semifinal berths for her best year as a pro to date.

Fichman improved from a low ranking of 239 on July 9 to her current world ranking of 153 by playing at a high level, defeating higher-ranking opponents and boosting her confidence. She has compiled a 42-26 record in 2012 to add to her career total of 198 wins and 127 losses.

"My results this year have made me feel that I can compete every day and do well. The Challenger circuit is tough, as each girl knows that every win or loss can make the difference between continuing a career in tennis or doing something else," Fichman said after finishing as runner-up to fellow Canadian Eugenie Bouchard of Montreal at the Tevlin Challenger in Toronto Nov. 5.

"It was my goal when I turned pro to be ranked among the top 50 to 100 best players in the world, and I still think that it will happen."

Known for her strong backhand ground strokes and quickness at the net, Fichman's mental approach of fighting for every point has suited her well.

Her main handicap is her size, at 5-3,

according to former pro tennis great Tracy Austin, who has seen Fichman compete at several Roger Cup tournaments.

"I think if Sharon had been from my era [1979-85], in which short players like myself, Chris Evert and Amanda Coetzer [at 5-2] all had great careers, her results would have been better. The pro circuit has many more tall players today, like Maria Sharapova [6-2], who has a great serve and a long reach at the net than was the case in the past," Austin said in a phone interview.

"That of course does not mean that a short player can't have a career in pro tennis. Justine Henin at 5-5 was a great champion, and Dominika Cibulkova at 5-3 is ranked No. 15 in 2012, so it can be done. But it's rare for a short player to beat a tall player consistently, especially at the net, where a tall player's reach can end a point," Austin said.

"I am aware that a tall player has an edge, but I play the angles well and like to think that my quickness on the court means I can be more nimble than some players, so I can pull out victories by working hard on every point," Fichman said.

Her speed has carried the day at her tournaments in 2012. Fichman won the $50,000 Waterloo Challenger in July by defeating five opponents in straight sets, including Julia Glushko of Israel 6-3, 6-2 in the title match.

She won her second title this year in August in Romania by defeating five opponents, including Romanian Patricia Marie 6-3, 6-7 (5), 6-2 in the final.

Fichman, who turned 22 on Dec. 3, was born in Toronto two years after her parents immigrated to Canada from Israel in 1988. Her parents arrived in Israel from Romania in 1983.

She started playing tennis at age five, following her brother Thomas, who was a top Canadian player in the 14-and-under age category.

In 2005, Fichman became the youngest athlete, at age 14, to win a gold medal at the Maccabiah Games in Israel. Fichman is also the first Jewish player to be selected to the Canadian national Fed Cup team (2005-present) since Vicki Berner of Vancouver played from 1963 to 1967.

To learn more about Fichman, go to www.tenniscanada.com.

Netanyahu phones Harper to convey thanks

Mulcair said under the Conservatives, Canada uses a Middle East peace policy consisting of "negativism, reproach, attack [and] threats. That's not constructive. That's not a way to build for peace. Under [Prime Minister] Stephen Harper's Conservatives, we no longer play a constructive role" for peace.

Meanwhile, interim Liberal Leader Bob Rae urged Canada to continue to dialogue with the Palestinians to further peace.

"We strongly urge the international community and our own Canadian government against punitive measures directed at the Palestinian Authority that will only destabilize the region.

"Diminishing Canada's engagement with the Palestinian Authority would only strengthen the positions of organizations that reject the peace process, reject a two-state solution and are not prepared to accept the existence of the State of Israel," Rae said in a statement on the Liberal party website.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) praised Canada's vote at the UN and chastised the PA for "celebrating an empty achievement at the UN."

Shimon Fogel, the centre's CEO, also admonished Mulcair for his remarks.

"I understand that it has become part of the job of the Opposition to criticize the government, regardless [of the subject]," he said.

"But the reality is there is no peace process. The reason is because the Palestinians are being enabled to circumvent direct negotiations. Canada's position exactly reflects that of the Americans and going back to UN Resolution 242, that the only meaningful thing that will advance the peace process is direct negotiations," Fogel said.

He added: "Mulcair's little bit of political theatre is nothing more than a distraction that doesn't meet the basic test that should be applied by him and everybody else: does this advance the interests of the Palestinians? The reality is it does not."

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called Harper over the weekend to thank Canada for its vote at the UN.

Requests by The CJN to the Prime Minister's Office for more details about that call were not returned by deadline.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas called the vote the "last chance to save the two-state solution," while Israeli envoy Ron Prosor said the "resolution does not advance peace."

Few benefits accrue to the "observer state of Palestine" that the Palestine Liberation Organization, the non-member entity until last Thursday, did not already have.

Membership in constituent UN organizations is still not automatic and "Palestine" must apply for membership in each, as it did when the PLO was a non-member entity.

A Palestinian bid last year to gain full UN membership failed when the bid died in the UN Security Council. Non-member observer status needs only General Assembly approval.

On Sunday, Israel declared its intention to add some 3,000 housing units in the West Bank in response to the UN vote.

Referring to the General Assembly vote, Netanyahu said at the cabinet meeting, "The attack on Zionism and the State of Israel forces us to reinforce and speed up the implementation of the settlement plans in all the areas the government has decided to settle in. These are not my words, but the words of the government of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1975 following the UN resolution that compared Zionism to racism."

Harper's spokesperson, Andrew MacDougall, told the Globe and Mail on Dec. 3 that Israel's decision to build more housing amounted to a unilateral decision.

"Canada's position is that unilateral actions on either side do not advance the peace process," he said.

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton criticized Israel's decision on Friday during a speech at the Saban Center for Middle East Policy in Washington.

"In light of today's announcement, let me reiterate that this administration... has been very clear with Israel that these activities set back the cause of a negotiated peace," Clinton said.

UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said in a statement that Israel's construction would "represent an almost fatal blow to remaining chances of securing a two-state solution."

The foreign ministries of France, Britain, Spain, Denmark and Sweden on Monday summoned and sharply rebuked the Israeli ambassadors to their countries, following a series of steps taken by Israel since the UN vote. An Israeli official quoted by Israel Radio said the tone of the rebukes was "harsh and very unpleasant."

An official from Netanyahu's bureau said Israel would not reverse its decision to approve an expansion of settlement building, even in the face of European pressure.

Chef brings a touch of Tuscany to Toronto

Jess Silver
Special to The CJN

For chef and restaurant owner Alida Solomon, the experience of eating should not be a quick one.

People who go out to eat should be rewarded with a memorable and lasting experience. That's something that she and her staff have placed emphasis on at their restaurant Tutti Matti.

Located in the heart of downtown Toronto at 64 Adelaide St. W., the Tuscan-style restaurant prides itself on the wholesomeness of its Italian peasant cooking, and using the simplest fresh, seasonal ingredients.

Solomon says it became evident that she wanted to become a chef when she was 16 years old and living in Israel on a kibbutz in Ashkelon.

"I was doing a two-month trip, and being a young kid, I didn't really want to be up at two in the morning picking cotton. So I asked them if I could anything else, and the lady who was in charge of the kitchen at the kibbutz said come work with me," she says. "The experience of being in the kitchen and serving 400 people was so communal and wonderful that it stuck with me."

It was one of those times when seeing people come together for one common purpose became a thing of beauty for her, she says.

She wanted to find a way to translate the communal experience of sitting down to a delicious meal into Canadian culture. That, she says, is what is different about the North American culture of eating compared to that of Italian cuisine.

"I think Italian cooking is more than just about eating," Solomon says. "It's about the conversation. The most important part of the day is when the family sits down together and shares the events of the day."

She says the length of time that Italians spent at the table fascinated her.

"In Toronto, you sit down for 20 minutes, if you have the time, and then get on with your day, but there the families are closer and the relationships are different," she says. "You're not just feeding yourself, you're eating, and there's a huge difference. I think that the Europeans are much better at conversation and enjoying what they're eating."

Interestingly, for Solomon and her staff, esthetic appeal and ambience were not priorities for them when the restaurant was founded in 2002. It was more about bringing the ingredients true to Tuscany and the ways of the Italian culture to Toronto.

"People are coming for the food. Keeping the menu traditional is most important," she says. "I wanted to give people a meal that they would have in Italy in December, in December."

Solomon in the kitchen (Rob Howard photos)

Chef Alida Solomon in her restaurant (Rob Howard photos)

The name of the restaurant, Tutti Matti, translates into "everyone's crazy," which she says means something evocative to her – that everyone's crazy about what they do in Italy.

"Everything they do is mostly based on passion," Solomon says. People working in the culinary industry create with passion, too, she adds.

She says she feels rewarded when cooking for her peers, although she mentioned that there is great pressure that comes with doing so. Recently, she and her staff prepared the specialty dishes of Tuscan peasant cooking for her peers who came from Italy.

She recalls the time a group of hunters came in and asked her to prepare the game that they captured, and she spoke of the honour she felt when asked to do something that demanded so much attention and skill.

The most important part of the preparation of the food is to do justice to the ingredient, Solomon says.

She became emotional when discussing Tutti Matti's recent 10-year anniversary last month, which she's very proud of. "For the first time as a chef and restaurant owner in Toronto, I feel that I've accomplished what I wanted."

Solomon says sometimes customers come in and ask her to make changes to a recipe, and she has to tell them that certain ingredients don't belong together.

"It's like going to surgeon and asking him to do something to you that you don't really need to have done. As a chef, we have a responsibility to our profession and to the ingredient. If we buy a chestnut and it's the centre and focus of the dish, it's important to taste the actual chestnut and not soy sauce masking the flavour," she says.

Her job is complete once she has given people "a great meal, a great conversation, a great bottle of wine and some laughter."

Not only is it a huge challenge and thrill to find ways to innovate upon simple, wholesome ingredients, but also with the recent increase in food allergies and sensitivities, chefs must exercise diligence to bring the best to customers while remaining attune to dietary concerns, Solomon says.

She says she believes the increase in food allergies may stem from feed that is given to livestock. While she notes that Tutti Matti is not a kosher restaurant, nor does it provide many vegetarian options, she speaks of the accommodations that her staff is willing make.

After all, it isn't for no reason, Solomon says, that a friend of hers from Tuscany calls her "the architect and engineer of flavour."

DAPHNA RABINOVITCH'S ISRAELI COUSCOUS LATKES

1 tbsp vegetable oil
6 green onions, chopped
1-1/3 c chicken stock
1-1/4 c Israeli couscous
1/4 c chopped fresh parsley
1/4 tsp each salt and pepper
2 eggs, lightly beaten
Vegetable oil

1. Heat oil in saucepan set over medium heat. Add green onions; cook, stirring, for 3 min. Pour in chicken stock. Bring to a boil. Stir in couscous. Cover and remove from heat. Let stand for 5 minutes. Fluff with fork. Stir in parsley, salt and pepper and then eggs.
2. In large non-stick skillet set over medium-high heat, heat about 1/4-inch of oil. Using 1/4 c measure, scoop out couscous, patting into measure. Add to pan, flattening slightly into a cake-like shape. Fry for 3 to 5 min. per side, until golden brown. Transfer to paper towel lined racks to drain slightly. Serve warm.

On cjnews.com

The CJN's French-language reporter in Montreal, Elias Levy, writes about:

Exclusive to cjnews.com

Hebrew web columnist Yossi Tassassa reflects upon the lessons of Operation Pillar of Defence.

Former Israeli ambassador to Canada Alan Baker, left, says that even if the UN General Assembly votes in favour of upgrading Palestinians from observer to "non-member observer" status - as was expected to happen Nov. 29 - the move would be legally meaningless in terms of their achieving actual statehood.

Historian Gérard Bouchard, co-chair of the Bouchard-Taylor Commission, who talks about the results of that inquiry into cultural accommodation in Quebec and about his latest book on interculturalism, a Quebec point of view.

Simon Benita, director of the departments of pharmacy and medicine at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, who was the guest of honour recently when the academic scholarship created jointly by the Fédération Sépharade du Canada and Hebrew U was officially established.

Pillar of Defence: a family's thoughts

During Operation Pillar of Defence, Israel's recent conflict with Hamas, I started an email thread with my Toronto-born family in Israel. Each paragraph below is a comment made by a different relative. Some live in Jerusalem; others in Tel Aviv and Eilat.

- Thanks to Avrum for recognizing we are here on the front lines of Jewish history. I do believe all is in the hands of God. As I sit here upset about the current lousy situation in our country, I can't help but contemplate the severe ramifications of our spineless leaders' decisions... Israel is always say, yeheyeh b'seder (it will be good). Shabbat shalom to all. I must get my mind on cooking for Shabbat. I wish a lasting and real peace for all of us.
- The past two nights I have been sleeping in my clothes. If God forbid there is a siren, I don't think it is possible for me to take it down three flights of stairs with four sleeping kids. I really don't understand how people in Sderot have been living like this for 12 years!

Urban Writer
Avrum Rosensweig

- Baruch HaShem, there are amazing miracles. More than 1,000 missiles have been shot into Israel in the last eight days and only five people (too many) have been killed. Life is so uncertain and you never know if a rocket will fall on your head. Right now things are quiet. Peace to all!

- I constantly checked the Israeli news looking for one thing: an announcement that Israel was going into Gaza. Instead, after eight days they kind of like Chanukah! Hmm... Bibi announced a unilateral ceasefire. And somehow, in Israel, things always go on and even improve and grow. There are a few prophecies that are coming true today. One example is the prophecy about how the land will yield abundant produce at the time of the redemption. I have been buying the most delicious organic dates you have ever eaten... They are sweet and almost juicy...

I get great comfort from the fact that I am privileged to give birth to kids in Israel and raise them in Israel. I feel like kids born in Israel have some kind of extra spice in them. Take that Hamas.

- So yeah, our leaders are wimps. But thank God for our land, our people and our Torah. We are not afraid of a long journey. We saw last week how amazing Israel and Israelis can be - strong, principled and caring. It must be so hard to be far away when so much is going on here. Right now, I'd really appreciate if you could get me a sandwich from Marky's restaurant (RIP).

- I couldn't concentrate on my work, so I wrote a post about my friend who survived a suicide bombing exactly 10 years ago today. <http://blogs.timesofisrael.com/november-21st-bus-bomb-again/> I don't want to travel on the Gush roads with the kids tonight since there are riots, stoning and nowhere to go if a siren goes off. I am starting in with the kids and ordering pizza.
- It started pouring the day after the ceasefire and has not stopped. In Eretz Yisrael, rain is a sign of how HaShem is feeling toward us. When it rains, it means he is pretty happy with how we are acting... We Avivans can now really understand what the people in the south are going through. I feel that HaShem is showering us with rain to show us all is for the best.

Chanukah Greetings 2012

Section B

The Canadian Jewish news

Symbols that are the promise of our future

Children know instinctively what their parents must constantly relearn: Chanukah is about more than latkes and candlelight. It is also about dreidels and chocolate coins – all modern symbols of actual markers of Jewish antiquity.

The dreidel has been around for centuries, and in many cultures, as a toy or an instrument of gambling. As a Chanukah plaything, however, it occupies a pre-eminent place in our cultural cupboard. Our sages tell us the dreidel was also used as a device for the coded learning of Torah to circumvent Antiochus' prohibition against Torah study.

The chocolate coins are today's surrogates for the ancient non-edible ones that were minted by the Jews as evidence of their sovereign independence, again, in defiance of the many conquerors who strove hard to quash our freedoms.

The candlelight, of course, is the core symbol of the holiday, the flames we light for eight successive days.

And the latkes, like their delicious counterpart – sufganiyot – are the excellent deep-fried food that we eat to enhance the pleasure and festivity of the holiday for the very reason that they are fried in oil – that is, a “descendant” of the oil that lasted for eight days when the Temple was rededicated.

But parents do know what we hope our young children won't yet learn until the time is right for them to do so: Chanukah is a serious holiday, too.

We sing hymnals to the Jews of yesterday.

We eulogize the Maccabees.

We praise God for the miracles.

But we don't explain or elaborate to our children upon the day-to-day details of what it actually meant for the Jews then, or for that matter Jews today, to show courage in the face of overwhelming opposing forces.

And for good reason.

The lesson is a hard one, acquired over time, through the full, daring, sometimes daunting living of life.

There is plenty of time still ahead of them for our children to learn that lesson.

That is why, for the youngsters and a little bit for us, too, the parents and grandparents, we make Chanukah a celebration of latkes, sufganiyot, candlelight, dreidels and chocolate coins. The symbols of our past must be the promise of our future.

Thus, we hope our readers' celebration of the holiday is a splendid, eight-day, richly happy, family-filled, peoplehood-inspiring one. And may that celebration also include some time for reading the diverse material in the following pages of this supplement.

Chag Samayach.

For a pair of shoes...

INS.org

"We will buy the poor for silver and the needy for a pair of shoes." Amos 8:6

WH. Auden once wrote, "Almost all of our relationships begin and most of them continue as forms of mutual exploitation, a mental or physical barter, to be terminated when one or both parties run out of goods."

I find this hard to accept. I really hope our poet had good friends. Not everyone in the world is out to exploit others. The Bible understood that some people were naturally susceptible to exploitation and warned us lest we begin to think too much like Auden and not enough like Amos.

Our verse above is often twinned with another from Amos: "Because they have sold for silver those whose cause was just, and the needy for a pair of shoes" (2:6). One contemporary Israeli commentary observes that this is the price of injustice. Those in positions of power and authority will have become so corrupt and extortion-ist that in order to live under their leadership, the poor will sell themselves for basic necessities.

Another interpreter believes that shoes are an inexpensive, insignificant item and that the choice of this metaphor illustrates the depth of a corrupt society. Another posits the exact opposite. Most of the poor go barefoot because shoes are expensive; corrupt leaders will sell out the poor to keep themselves in shoes. Still other commentaries understand this verse more literally. Shoes were often used in business or other deals as a sign of transaction – this is true in the rejection of Levirate marriage as described in the book of Ruth. Rashi sees shoes as representative of land purchase, perhaps because land was often measured by footfalls.

Rashi translates the term in question not as "shoe" but as a reference to a "locked door," since the two words have a common Hebrew root. The rich would buy up land from the poor, locking away real estate for themselves and taking away the little security that a needy person might have.

There is a very old midrash on this expression that states that when his brothers sold Joseph, they used the money to purchase shoes for themselves. In essence, they were benefiting personally from the sale of another human being. While this purchase never makes an actual appearance in the Bible, Genesis does tell us that after Joseph's brothers threw him in a pit, they sat down to eat lunch. This small detail tells us everything we need to know about their callousness at that moment. Subsequently, the expression "to sell someone for a pair of shoes" is used to capture particularly harsh and cutting behaviour that lacks compassion and humanity.

There is a chassidic story that I have always loved and think of sometimes in the face of rejection. A young yeshiva student who was dirt poor went door-to-door in his village to ask for a few dollars to buy himself a pair of shoes. The young man was considered a prodigy, but his feet were bare.

He approached the door of the village's most wealthy family, only to have the door slammed in his face. He was utterly humiliated. Years passed, and the young scholar achieved great fame and was scheduled to speak in the village of his old yeshiva. The wealthy man who had ignored his plea years earlier approached him and offered to cover the cost of publishing the scholar's first book.

In earnest, the prodigy looked him straight in the eye and rejected his offer with these words: "No, thank you. But there was a time when you could have had me for a pair of shoes."

Amos understood that compassion must be a greater driver in creating a just society than self-interest. The fact that you can buy someone for a pair of shoes does not mean that you should. Those who have that kind of power over others – be it financial or emotional – must temper it with grace. Kindness is the measure of a good society.

You never know who you might bump into

Jay Wohlgeleerenter

Have you ever had one of those days when you are just really happy that you went to work? Today was one of those days!

I recently started working at Schneider Children's Hospital as an attending pediatric ear, nose and throat specialist.

This morning, one of the other doctors asked me if I could see a baby who had become hoarse. She told me she was very busy and would really appreciate the help. As the new kid on the block and with special training in managing pediatric airways, I obviously said yes, even though my clinic was bursting at the seams and the wait time for my patients was already approximately two hours.

When I finally called in this sweet little eight-month old boy, I learned that he had undergone open-heart surgery for a congenital heart defect two months earlier. Since his surgery, he had developed severe hoarseness and was coughing during feeds. His twin brother, who had also undergone heart surgery, was waiting outside with his grandmother. I apologized to his mother and grandfather for the long wait. The grandfather had come in from Jerusalem to help his daughter with her twin boys. Once I examined the baby's larynx with the fibre-optic endoscope, the suspected diagnosis of vocal cord paralysis was confirmed.

This is unfortunately a recognized complication of open-heart surgery in young children.

After I explained the diagnosis, prognosis and the future plan to his mother, as well as setting up an appointment to have his swallow function evaluated, his grandfather who had been quite fidgety during the whole encounter, turned to me and asked if I was American or British. I smiled and told him neither.

I'm Canadian, I told him. His daughter was embarrassed and informed him that Canadians hate being mistaken for Americans. He then looked me in the eyes and told me that a Canadian doctor had once saved his life. He thought for minute and said that his name was similar to mine and sounded something like Dr. Jay.

I asked for more details and he proceeded to tell me that he attended the doctor's wedding. I lowered my voice and asked him what his name was, although by then I already knew. His eyes widened, and he said his name was Rahamim Mizrahi. I felt lightheaded and got up from my chair. He started to cry and ran over to me.

He gave me a big hug and kiss. He grabbed the back of my head and asked what happened to my ponytail. I think some background information would be in order here.

Around 10 years ago, I used to work as a doctor on a mobile intensive care ambulance in Jerusalem. One cold winter night at around 3 a.m., we got called out to a home in the neighbourhood of Gilo. A 59-year-old man who had suffered in the past from two heart attacks and had had coronary bypass surgery had rolled out of bed on his head and was dead on the floor.

A regular ambulance arrived on scene approximately 15 minutes before us and started CPR. From my experience, the effectiveness of basic rescuer CPR was very limited in its ability to maintain adequate levels of oxygen to the brain. A quarter of an hour would almost certainly result in irreversible brain damage. Once on the scene, we immediately started a full resuscitation including mechanical ventilation, intravenous medications and repeatedly shocking his heart with a defibrillator in what appeared to be a vain attempt to jump start it again.

After about 20 minutes, my paramedic turned to me and said, "Dr. Jay, just call it." Meaning I should recognize the futility of our actions and pronounce him dead. At that time, it seemed like the right thing to do.

However, this was a 59-year-old man lying on the floor in his bedroom. His wife and 18-year-old son were watching us throughout the whole ordeal and praying for their father to stay with them just a little longer.

According to my monitor, he still had what appeared to be electrical activity in his heart. This is despite the fact that he hadn't had a pulse for nearly 40 minutes. I instructed my team to keep on with the resuscitation efforts until we either got his heartbeat back or all signs of activity in his heart ceased. Finally, after we had been working on him for 45 minutes, administered countless drugs and delivered a total of 16 powerful electrical shocks to his chest, we got a heartbeat.

It was weak, it was a thread, but it was real.

We loaded him onto the gurney to the ambulance unconscious, mechanically ventilated, and likely never to recover any sort of meaningful life.

Sirens wailing through the deserted streets of Jerusalem, we rushed him to the Shaare Zedek Medical Center emergency department.

SMART SET

'I always tell them that miracles can happen'

I did not feel good about this resuscitation. I did not feel that we were heroes or lifesavers. I figured, at best, he would die within the next few hours and, at worst, he would live for a few years as a vegetable, breathing through a hole in his neck and eating through a tube in his stomach. I had seen it countless times and I wouldn't wish it on anybody. I distinctly remember the doctor in the ER looking at me and asking cynically why I had even bothered resuscitating him.

Although, on an academic level, I was interested to know what had happened to him, the whole incident left me feeling pretty lousy, and I didn't follow up on his condition. I guess that's one of the cold mechanisms we employ to shield ourselves from the abject suffering to which we are exposed – close the chapter and move right on.

Around two months later, I got a strange call from a woman who claimed to be his daughter. She had some difficulty finding me, but wanted to update me on his progress.

After lying in the intensive care unit for two days, he awoke from his coma. He was somewhat confused and suffered significant memory lapses. For example, he thought this 20-year-old daughter was still in sixth grade and was wondering why she hadn't finished her homework. This confused state lasted for two more weeks. Then one morning, he woke up and his memory was back. He was completely oriented and aware of everything that had happened. A full recovery by any standard!

From that time on, his daughter had made great efforts to locate me because they wanted to have a thanksgiving party and they didn't want to have it without me present. I was both shocked and thrilled. It was a great party – delicious food, and a far more festive atmosphere than the previous time I had been at his house.

This reunion was followed a few months later by Rahamim's attendance at my wedding where we all danced with unmitigated joy.

That was 9-1/2 years ago.

Since then, I have often thought about Rahmi, as he likes to be called.

Every time a patient in serious condition, or a family member, has asked me if there is hope, he comes to mind. I always tell them that miracles can happen and I've even seen a few in my life.

That being said, within a short time we fell out of touch. As before, I never made any significant effort to find out what happened to this remarkable man because I was afraid that I would not find him alive. His prognosis after what his heart had been through so many times was poor.

Once again after our serendipitous, emotional reunion today, I am amazed at what the human spirit and body can overcome. He remembered in perfect detail my father, and that he is a psychiatrist who was interested in talking with him about his experience of being clinically dead for an hour. He remembered how my father took him around the wedding to bless the various guests. He remembered my wife and gently reprimanded me for flirting with a nurse in the clinic today.

He called his wife in from the waiting room with her other miracle grandson, who had also undergone heart surgery. She didn't recognize me at first. I told her not to worry because the first time I had been in her house things were crazy, as we were busy with a resuscitation. She almost fell over in disbelief. It was amazing to see her again. I told them that their grandson would now be my patient for many years to come and that I would personally make sure that he has a crisp, clear voice.

I fully intend to dance at his wedding the same way his grandfather danced at mine.

As I said before, once in a while it's really worthwhile to go to work.

You never know who you just might bump into.

Jay Wohlgeleenter made aliyah some years ago and now lives in Tel Aviv. This story first appeared in both Ha'aretz and the Jerusalem Post.

Chanukah in the Warsaw Ghetto

Rafael Medoff
JNS.org

"Never before in Jewish Warsaw were there as many Chanukah celebrations as in this year of the wall."

That entry from the diary of Hebrew educator Chaim Kaplan in December 1940, shortly after the walls of the Warsaw Ghetto were built, may surprise those who are accustomed to thinking of the ghetto only in terms of the misery of its Jewish residents under the Nazi jackboot. But in those early months of the ghetto, before the worst periods of deprivation and persecution overwhelmed the Jews, their spirit showed on the first Chanukah behind the walls.

"Because of the sword that hovers over our heads," the 1940 Chanukah festivities were not held in the streets, Kaplan wrote. "Chanukah parties were held in nearly every courtyard, even in rooms which face the street; the blinds were drawn, and that was sufficient. How much joy, how much of a feeling of national kinship there was in these Chanukah parties! After sixteen months of Nazi occupation [since the German invasion of Poland in September 1939], we came to life again."

Kaplan was particularly pleased that "we even deceived the Judenrat," the Nazi-appointed Jewish leadership. "It tried to ban the holding of Chanukah parties without a special permit... But this took effect only on paper; the Judenrat was fooled. Hundreds of celebrations were arranged and the stupid Judenrat did not get a single penny."

In his diary, Kaplan quoted from a speech by a Zionist leader at one of the Chanukah events: "In all the countries where they want to bury us alive, we pull the gravediggers in with us." Kaplan could not realize how prophetic those words would prove less than three years later, when the fighters of the Warsaw Ghetto revolt would take down many Nazis before losing their own lives.

Kaplan, 40, was the founder and principal of a Hebrew elementary school in Warsaw. He began keeping a diary, in Hebrew, in 1933. His entries about life in Jewish Warsaw following the construction of the ghetto walls offer a heartbreaking chronicle of disease, starvation, random atrocities and, ultimately, mass deportations.

With 30 per cent of Warsaw's population crammed into an area comprising barely two per cent of the city, extreme overcrowding facilitated the rapid spread of disease. At the same time, Jews were limited to food rations of just 181 calories daily. By the summer of 1941, more than 5,000 Jews were dying monthly from starvation or disease.

Kaplan's diary entries throughout 1941 describe side-walks filled with "families bundled up in rags, moaning with heartrending voices," "formerly well to do people who never had to worry about matters of food" crowding the soup kitchens and "waiting their turn for a bowl of watery soup," and random atrocities such as a Nazi with "a face as red as fire" wielding an iron whip, savagely lashing an elderly Jew for 20 minutes straight.

Part of the wall surrounding the Warsaw Ghetto

There were too many horrors for the diarist to keep up with. "My inkwell has grown tired of lamentations," Kaplan wrote at one point. "If I tried to write down everything in order, I couldn't. Nor would I be recording anything new. Robberies, murders, humiliations, deprivations—nothing more."

By the time the reader reaches Kaplan's diary entries for Chanukah in 1941, the contrast with those of the preceding year is evident. The festive and defiant mood of 1940 was just a distant memory. "This year very few Chanukah candles were lit," Kaplan wrote in December 1941. "Our holiday has been turned into a day of mourning. The courtyard of the prison on Dzielna Street was turned into a slaughterhouse today." 15 Jews caught outside the city limits had been lined up and executed.

In the months to follow, the situation grew steadily worse. Random killings became more frequent and better organized. "Not a day goes by that the Nazis do not conduct a slaughter," Kaplan recorded.

The first deportations began in July 1942

Children in the Warsaw Ghetto

Homelessness, disease, and starvation reached epidemic proportions. "In the gutters, amidst the refuse, one can see almost naked and barefoot little children wailing pitifully," Kaplan wrote. "Every morning you will see their little bodies frozen to death in the ghetto streets."

By the early summer of 1942, refugees reaching Warsaw from elsewhere in Poland provided details of the fate that awaited each Jewish community targeted by the Nazis. Jews deported from their towns were taken "in tightly sealed freight cars," Kaplan wrote, "until they come to the place of their execution, where they are killed."

In July 1942, Warsaw's turn came. Kaplan described the first deportations in agonizing detail. Recording the tragedy of his people had become his life's purpose, even as others doubted: "Some of my friends and acquaintances who know the secret of my diary urge me, in their despair, to stop writing. 'Why? For what purpose? Will you live to see it published? Will these words of yours reach the ears of future generations?'"

Somehow, they did.

In early August 1942, realizing the end was near, Kaplan stuffed his diaries into kerosene cans and entrusted them to a friend who was able to smuggle them to a Polish acquaintance in a nearby village. Kaplan and his wife would not live to see another Chanukah. They were deported from Warsaw and gassed soon afterwards in the Treblinka death camp.

The Polish villager eventually sold the diaries to New York University. Scroll of Agony: The Warsaw Diary of Chaim A. Kaplan was first published in English in 1965, then subsequently in Kaplan's beloved Hebrew and four other languages. Although Kaplan did not live to see his words in print, the spirit of defiance he witnessed in the Chanukah celebrations of 1940 lives on in the diary that has become one of the most important sources of eyewitness testimony about the Holocaust.

Chanukah: the untold story

Binyamin Kagedan
INS.org

During the eight days of Chanukah, traditional Jews add the following to their daily prayers: "In the days of Mattathias the son of Johanan the High Priest, the Hasmonean and his sons, when the evil kingdom of Greece set upon your nation Israel to make them forget your teachings, and to remove them from the laws you desire. You in Your great mercy... gave the mighty into the hands of the weak, the many into the hands of the few, the impure into the hands of the pure."

Sound familiar? The little history lesson in this prayer is probably very close to the story of Judah Maccabee and King Antiochus you remember from Hebrew school: The underdog heroes attain a miraculous victory over the powerful villains against all odds, winning back their religious freedom and purifying the defiled Temple in Jerusalem.

That's the short story. The longer version is not quite as heartwarming or morally clear-cut. Ancient historical records, especially the little known Book of Maccabees, actually tell of a bitter and bloody internal conflict that pitted Jew against Jew in a fight for political and religious domination.

Towards the end of the fourth century

King Antiochus (Jniemenmaa)

BCE, Greek Hellenistic culture had spread to every part of Alexander the Great's massive empire, and Judea was no exception. Certain Jews, mainly those belonging to the wealthy elite of Jerusalem, enthusiastically embraced the offerings of this culture — Greek names and dress, the gymnasium, even the Greek gods — and carried the favor of Alexander's heirs, the ruling Seleucids, in return for their co-operation. The poorer farming communities of the rural Judean countryside, however, resisted the changes that were sweeping the ancient world, unwilling to give up the traditional Jewish beliefs and customs of their ancestors.

The focal point of the conflict was often the high priesthood, which at the time was the most powerful office in the land. Tensions boiled over when Hellenized Jews paid Seleucid king Antiochus Epiphanes (the famous Antiochus of the Chanukah story), to replace the reigning high priest with a Hellenist sympathizer who was not born of the priestly line. At that time, explained historian Solomon Grayzel, Antiochus' actions were economically and politically motivated, and had nothing to do with suppressing the Jewish religion. After all, there is no record of him imposing anti-Jewish policies on the many other diaspora Jewish communities under his rule. However, when Antiochus' power play sparked an uprising in and around Jerusalem, he reacted harshly by banning circumcision and observance of dietary laws within Judea, and erecting a statue of Zeus in the Holy Temple.

Now the growing rift in Judean society blew wide open. Hellenized Jews not only supported the repressive policy, but also helped Antiochus' men violently enforce it in the traditional Judean villages.

In response, when the traditionalists rose up under the leadership of Mattathias, their fury was directed at their Hellenized countrymen. 1 Maccabees reports that Mattathias' followers, called Chassidim, or "pious ones," slaughtered assimilated Jews and circumcised male children by force.

Fearing for their lives, well-connected Hellenists called upon the Seleucid armies for protection, and it was with the ensuing battle that the well-known version of the Chanukah story begins.

Binyamin Kagedan has a master's degree in Jewish thought from the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

Finally, the Jewish community is talking about disability

Martin Krossel

In the Times of Israel on April 30, Rabbi Shmuley Boteach commendably criticized his rabbinical colleague Aron Moss for suggesting that a child with a mental disability has been given a special divine blessing.

If nothing else, Rabbi Boteach is contributing to a long-needed conversation about how the Jewish community deals with members who have mental and physical disabilities. For many decades, that status of such individuals was just not discussed. The reasons for this silence are, I think, complex. In part they're unintended consequences of our people's emphasis on academic and professional achievement. The other side of boasting about the accomplishments of some children is that parents often were quiet about children who were unable to have such success. Another contributor to this silence, I suspect, has been parents' understandable reluctance to "burden" already challenged children with a Jewish education. Didn't children with disabilities have enough hurdles to overcome without having to assume the responsibility for preparing for a bar or bat mitzvah or taking on an "extra" Jewish education?

You can grasp the extent to which Jews with disabilities are excluded from communal organizations when you consider that its widely estimated the somewhere between one in 10 and one and seven individuals among the general population have a serious disability. There is no reason to believe that the incidence of disability is any lower among Jews than among the rest of the population. However, I suspect that most readers do not see Jews with disabilities participating actively in synagogues and other Jewish organizations.

Fortunately, just as the general community is taking up the issue of people with "special needs" – the current "politically correct" term for persons with disabilities – Jewish communities are beginning to look at policies directed to this segment of this population. The Jewish press is filled with articles about how the needs of this segment of the Jewish population are and are not being met. Last December, for instance, New York's Jewish Week reported that Boston's Ruderman Foundation had sponsored a conference for funders and full-time professionals working in the Jewish disability field. At the conference, the foundation announced that it was launching a $200,000 Ruderman Prize in Disability, "to recognize excellence and innovation in 'unique Jewish programming', as well as advocacy and support for Jews with special needs. In a recent op-ed in the Jewish Week, Jennifer Laszlo, a public relations consultant who has raised a special needs child, argued for a "national strategy" that would "serve and include people with disabilities". The Jewish Journal in Los Angeles carries a blog by Michelle Wolff, who documents her triumphs and tribulations of raising a child with a disability.

What has been missing in the embryonic Jewish conversation is the presence of Jewish individuals who actually have a disability. To some extent this is being addressed in the new Sundance Channel TV series Push Girls.

As an individual with a physical disability, I am irked by the frequent media portrayal of persons with disabilities as either helpless individuals who should be pitied or individuals who should be placed on a pedestal for living exceptionally courageous or heroic lives. Most of us struggle from day to day just trying to lead fulfilling and productive lives.

Earlier this year, I turned 60. I have had cerebral palsy since birth. This slurs my speech, makes my gait awkward, and greatly impairs the use of my hands. I have also lived much of my life as an observant Jew. So I know something about what it's like to function as a person with a disability being active within the Jewish community.

On my birthday Shabbat, my wife and I sponsored the kiddush. The rabbi devoted his sermon to how inspirational I supposedly am for walking to shul every week, even when sometimes this is difficult for me. And, indeed, walking has become more difficult for me as I've gotten older. Still, talk of my being exceptionally inspirational or heroic has always made me uncomfortable.

I have known a number of people with disabilities who have adopted distinctively Jewish lifestyles. As for me, I've just done what I've seen hundreds of people do: allow their behavior to be shaped by Halachah, as much as possible.

I didn't do this for any kind of kavod or praise. I believe Halachah to be Divinely ordained and that I have no dispensation from performing mitzvot to the best of my ability just because of my physical challenges.

I think that Rabbi Boteach is right to argue that having a disability is never a blessing.

'Parents expected me to excel'

There is no natural advantage to having a disability, and there has never been a time when I didn't wish that I didn't have cerebral palsy. It makes everything, including living Jewish, more difficult.

Still, the greatest obstacles that people with disabilities encounter aren't always the natural ones. People with disabilities often say that their greatest challenges come not from their disability, but from the actions and attitudes of other people. For example, I sometimes have to deal with people who think that I have a mental disability.

When I was of Hebrew school age, my parents couldn't find a congregational Hebrew school that would accept me as a student. The administrators of every congregational school in my native Toronto claimed that I couldn't handle a religious education in addition to my secular studies. Later, two universities reached different conclusions about what I could achieve academically. By admitting me, they enabled me to earn an MBA and a master's in political science. And, although I didn't accept, I was offered admission to the journalism programs at Columbia and NYU. Fortunately, there was a small family-run Hebrew school in Toronto that taught me the basics of Hebrew, Torah and prayer, as well as training me for my bar mitzvah.

'The greatest obstacles that people with disabilities encounter aren't always the natural ones'

In saying that my disability is a burden, I do not want to imply that I believe I have not been blessed. Indeed I have, and in many ways.

I was blessed with parents who drove me to strive and to succeed. They expected me to excel educationally and professionally. My parents also expected me to be Jewishly literate. I watched my late father pray every day. Shabbat and holidays were always celebrated in our home. Dad also wanted me to have an intensive Jewish education. He didn't consider mere preparations to chant at my bar mitzvah to be adequate. Every Shabbat afternoon, he studied the weekly Torah portion with me.

Synagogue attendance, first on Shabbat and then on weekday mornings, became part of my regular routine. My university years – where as an undergraduate I took a number of courses in Jewish history and philosophy – provided another opportunity for Jewish involvement.

In the early 1970s, campuses were just beginning to become hostile to Israel. I was recruited to write editorials for a pro-Israel student newspaper at the University of Toronto. That changed my life.

The research and preparation necessary to write a weekly column strengthened my attachment to Zionism and Israel. I've been blessed to have visited Israel five times. At one time I thought about making aliyah, which would have been very difficult to say the least, given my physical limitations.

Sometimes I think about how different my relationship with Judaism would have been if I had another disability. I'm blessed to be relatively mobile and have no impairment of either my hearing or sight. Had I been unable to walk, or if I were deaf or blind, I doubt whether I could have had a meaningful synagogue experience, which led to all of my future ties to the Jewish community. In other words, with another set of disabilities, I could only have had, at best, a superficial relationship with my ancestral faith, and I would have become largely lost to my people.

Herein lies the basis of some discomfort that I have with the way that the Jewish community approaches its policy toward people with "special needs."

All of the focus seems to be on providing Jewish educations for children with disabilities as well as making synagogues and religious services accessible to people with "special needs." All of this is, of course, very important. But I believe that the Jewish community's objectives should be more ambitious. While there will always be Jews with the kinds of disabilities that will make them dependent on tzedakah, Jewish communal organizations should adopt a more holistic approach.

Programming for Jews with disabilities should be part of larger strategies of communal outreach that attempt to incorporate unaffiliated Jews in all aspects of Jewish life. One area in which much improvement is needed is career development. I dream of seeing a time when people with disabilities are rabbis, Jewish educators and communal professionals. Perhaps it is advisable for the seminaries and other educational institutions that train people for these careers to make special efforts to attract suitable candidates who have disabilities.

This will probably be the last article that I write about my disability. I don't like writing about having cerebral palsy. My disability has been and always will be part of who I am. But I try not to let it define me. One of the aspects of journalism that has attracted me was it allowed me to do work that would be judged solely on its merit, without being colored by my disability. I'm much more interested in readers knowing my take on the latest twist in Middle East politics or Jewish communal affairs than in sharing my musings about living with a disability.

China nurtured Sinophile Dolly Beil

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

"China welcomed and nurtured us and gave us life," said Dolly Beil in a lilting voice redolent of the Orient.

A vivacious, feisty woman who was born and raised in China, Beil is a Sinophile through and through. Although Jewish, she is thoroughly Chinese in upbringing, cultural leanings, love of Chinese art and opera, facility in Mandarin and culinary preferences.

"I spent my formative years in China," said Beil, who marks her 85th birthday on Christmas and has lived in Toronto since her arrival in Canada in 1952.

Beil, who was brought up by a Chinese nursemaid, an amahi, was born in the port city of Tsingtao on Dec. 25, 1927, lived in the cities of Mukden, Harbin and Tientsin, as well as Japan, and was conveyed to her wedding in 1946 in a rickshaw.

"I have fond memories of China," said Beil, whose memoir Growing up Jewish in China (BPS Books), was published recently. "Jews were very well treated in China. We never suffered discrimination. China was a friendly, friendly nation. We really lived absolutely like in paradise. We had a good life in China."

Beil, who lives in a house in the Bathurst Street-Steeles Avenue area overflowing with Chinese art, artifacts and handicrafts, is second-generation Chinese.

Her mother, Basia Gershevich, was born in Harbin, a city in northern China settled by Russian Jews in the 19th and 20th centuries. Her father, Alexander Solomonovich Guterman, originally from the Siberian city of Novosibirsk, arrived in China in 1919 and married Basia about a year later.

Like many of the Russian expatriates in China, Alexander was a businessman. He was successively a jeweller and then the proprietor of a jewelry store and a café.

Dolly Beil today

He earned enough to provide his family with every possible comfort. By conventional Chinese standards, the Gutermans lived in the lap of luxury, catered to by three servants: a chef, an amahi and a "boy."

Beil acquired conversational Mandarin from her amahi, who would regale her with stories about Chinese legends and cook Chinese meals for her.

Years later, in Canada, Beil would amaze and delight Chinese people when she effortlessly broke into fluent Mandarin.

As she recalls, Jews in China lived insular, self-contained, sheltered lives, living among the Chinese but never really socializing with them or integrating into their society.

For Beil, there was no such thing as anti-Semitism. "We were revered by the Chinese," she said.

The Japanese occupation of Tientsin in 1941 did not affect the Jewish community. Jews were free to attend synagogue and their own schools, though the Japanese authorities demanded that the Japanese language be introduced into the curriculum.

In the summer of 1945, as the Beils vacationed in the resort of Peitaiho, they felt a light tremor approximating a light thud. "The next day, we heard rumours that an atomic bomb had been dropped on Hiroshima," she writes.

Tientsin was liberated by the U.S. Marines, who hired Beil as an office typist.

On her wedding day, a man-pulled rickshaw took her and her fiancé, Bob, a native of Manchuria, to synagogue. The rickshaw was padded with snow-white cotton, its fenders embossed with highly polished brass inlaid with dragons.

On July 10, 1947, she gave birth to her first child, a boy who would be named Mark.

With a civil war raging in China pitting Communists against Nationalists, the Beils, in 1949, decided to leave.

Beil's mother's sister, Eva, and her husband had already immigrated to Canada. They asked Eva to sponsor them.

"It was very hard leaving China," said Beil.

In her book, she writes, "To me, leaving China was inconceivable, although at heart, I would have liked to experience life somewhere else."

In another passage, she observes, "I loved the kindness of the Chinese people and their patience with foreigners."

She and Bob arrived by ship in Vancouver and made their way to Toronto. Her parents followed them to Canada about a month later.

They had no trouble adjusting to Canada. Beil became a mother again, giving birth to Monica in 1958. Bob, who died in 1993, prospered as a manufacturer of watchbands. For many years, while he ran his business, she owned an antique and jewelry shop in Toronto.

Beil returned to China on a visit in 2004, but much to her disappointment, the old, nostalgic vistas she had loved had disappeared in the name of progress.

Today, Beil is writing a sequel to Growing up Jewish in China. Her mother, 105, appears to be in good health. As she put it, "She wears heels and dresses."

Ethiopian immigrants arrive, thrust into war zone

Ben Sales
JTA

The explosion occurred close enough to Stesyahu Alema to shake his apartment, where he sat with his wife and two of his five children.

But he didn't flinch. None of them did. "There are a lot of people with me, so I don't need to worry," Alema told JTA. "I don't worry."

The Alemas were among 91 Ethiopian immigrants who arrived in Israel last week, just a day after Israel's Operation Pillar of Defence began. The new olim immediately were sent to the Ibim immigrant absorption centre, a former aliyah youth village run by the Jewish Agency for Israel about three miles from the Gaza border. Other immigrant absorption centres were full.

During a visit, two explosions rocked the area in the space of just a few minutes. The first, a rocket launched from Gaza into Israel, had prompted a warning siren, sending the Alema family into the reinforced room that doubled as their children's bedroom. One of the Alema daughters slept through the echoing impact that followed.

A young boy receives his inoculation in Gondar before leaving for Israel.

The Alema family knew that bombs were falling all around them, but they didn't know much about Israel's five-day-old operation, not even its name. They didn't know about the senior Hamas officials that Israel had killed or about the frantic push for a ceasefire that day in Cairo.

What was clear was that their world had been turned upside down, having moved from a subsistent existence in a sleepy town in rural Ethiopia to the epicentre of an escalating conflict. And they knew when the siren sounded to get into the children's bedroom.

Usually when a planeload of Ethiopian immigrants arrives at Ben-Gurion Airport in Tel Aviv, the Ethiopians go through the same process as any other group of immigrants: they receive some food, temporary identity cards and health insurance, and some cash to see them through the month.

But when the Alemas landed, along with their health insurance, documents and money, they received a security briefing from the Jewish Agency, which helped facilitate their immigration.

Ethiopian families at Ibim this week did not seem preoccupied with the war next door. Children played in a yard outside their apartments, while parents became accustomed to amenities they never had in Ethiopia, like refrigerators and electric stoves. Some had never even slept in beds.

"In Ethiopia, we slept on the floor, on top of each other," Alema said. His wife, Yikanu, added, "We had no light. We had leeches. That's why we're happy here."

The Ethiopian immigrants didn't venture far from their apartments in case an alarm sounded and they had to run back inside.

The group also avoided congregating: instead of a communal Shabbat meal, each family remained in its apartment to eat the traditional meal with flat, thick injera, the pancake-like Ethiopian staple.

"Instead of dealing with them, trying to absorb them, I'm trying to explain the security situation," said Moshe Bahta, who immigrated to Israel from Ethiopia in 1980 and now runs Ibim. "I told them the Arabs want to throw us into the sea and we're not ready to acquiesce. Since Israel was established, until today, there's never been quiet – always war."

Alemnh Yeshuas, another immigrant, said his apartment feels spacious enough, even if he can't always leave it.

"We have four rooms in our apartment here, running water and a bathroom," he said. One of his daughters had a faint blue cross tattooed on her forehead.

Bahta said that to give the immigrants a sense of normalcy, he "broadcasts security to them," always remaining calm – even as rockets land.

"It's OK to be scared, but don't lose control," he said. "We don't know what's going to be tomorrow, but meanwhile we don't panic. If you go into the reinforced room, nothing will happen."

Yeshuas said any fear of rockets paled in comparison to the spiritual fulfilment he got from finally living in Israel.

"We've dreamed many years of getting to Israel," he said. "The dream is realized and we're very happy. I believe in God – God knows."

Bahta said Ethiopians are used to thinking in terms of survival. "If you have food, good. If not, you die," he said.

None of them would refuse an opportunity to move to Israel, he said. Many Ethiopians see Israel as a land of plenty and a way out of Africa's desperate poverty. For many, aliyah is the realization of a lifelong dream.

"Every beginning is hard, but the hardship gets cancelled out because of the happiness," Bahta said. "You realized the dream. What, they shouldn't come? There's nothing like that. This will change their lives."

EU sanctions no match for Tehran's tricks: experts

Cnaan Lipshiz

JTA

With embargoes on Iranian gas and oil firmly in place, the European Union seems determined to tighten a net of sanctions around Iran, as even longtime critics of Europe's trade relations with Iran acknowledge.

In a second round of sanctions this year, the European Union announced that it was prohibiting some transactions between European companies and Iranian banks and limit areas of trade "in order to choke off revenue that Iran is using for its nuclear program," as British Foreign Secretary William Hague put it last month.

The Israeli Foreign Ministry called the EU's new package, which slapped a fresh embargo on gas to complement July's oil embargo, "an important step" and "strong message."

Still, critics say that the EU's net has large holes that allow Iran to penetrate Europe through Turkey, China and even Lebanon-based Hezbollah, among other entities. Only blanket sanctions, they say, will prevent Iran from using money from Europe to fuel its nuclear program.

In the EU process, companies suspected of being Iranian fronts can be blacklisted only after review and based on hard evidence. Obtaining such evidence requires much time and effort by intelligence agencies.

"By the time one such company is blacklisted, the Iranians have set up 10 new ones," said Emanuele Ottolenghi of the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies in Washington.

Ottolenghi says that only an American-style trade embargo on Iran can allow the EU to catch up with Iran's speedy turnarounds. The U.S. has had a near ban on trade with Iran since the 1980s – its trade volume of less than $200 million (all figures Cdn) with the Islamic Republic consists largely of grain exports. By contrast, the EU's volume of trade with Iran was $15 billion in 2011, which marks a 60 per cent decline from 2005.

The latest EU sanctions proscribe all import of petrochemical products from Iran; export and import of weapons; nuclear and telecommunications equipment; investment in Iran's oil industry; and trade in gold with Iran, among other measures.

Certain assets of Iran's central bank have been seized, but transactions "related to foodstuffs, health care, medical equipment, agricultural or humanitarian purposes, personal remittances and a specific trade contract" are permitted. In total, the EU has blacklisted 471 Iranian entities.

'Iran is completely opaque'

Ottolenghi, the Italian-born former director of the American Jewish Committee's Transatlantic Institute in Brussels, says that European companies are abiding by the EU sanctions. He expects a third round of European sanctions to be announced in the coming months.

But the Iranian work-arounds to the European sanctions are numerous and ingenious, Ottolenghi says, noting a relatively simple Iranian trick: trading with Europe through Turkey, a preferred trade partner of the EU and a country that Iranians may enter without a travel visa.

As Iran's trade with the EU plummets, its trade with Turkey is reaching record levels: $17.52 billion in the first eight months of 2012, compared to $15 billion in 2011. It stood at a mere $1 billion in 2000, according to the Turkish Statistical Institute. Iran is now Turkey's third-largest trade partner and main country for exports.

Part of the exports may be proscribed European goods that Iran is buying from Europe through Turkish front companies that are set up and run by Iranians with Turkish nationality on behalf of the Iranian government, Ottolenghi says.

In response to EU sanctions, he says, Iran is transferring business to companies in Ukraine, Taiwan and Japan, among other countries.

"If the U.S. and the EU are serious about sanctions, they need to squeeze these countries about ties with Iran," he said.

Just as European sanctions may be encouraging Turkey-Iran trade relations, they also may drive Iran increasingly to rely on Hezbollah for money laundering and purchases. Hezbollah is not black-listed anywhere in Europe except in the Netherlands.

"By sanctioning Iran and not Hezbollah, the European Union is virtually inviting Iran to do business through hundreds if not thousands of Hezbollah-affiliated proxies all over the continent," said Wim Kortenoeven, a former Dutch lawmaker and ex-Middle East researcher for the

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad speaking in Brazil in 2009

Center for Information and Documentation on Israel in The Hague.

Claude Moniquet, a former researcher for France's foreign intelligence service and co-founder of the Brussels-based European Strategic Intelligence and Security Center, said that Hezbollah has a "very large money-laundering operation in Europe," but added that he does not know whether Hezbollah had the capacity to handle any extra business for the Iranians in Europe.

France reportedly is resisting calls to blacklist Hezbollah in order to preserve relations with its former colony, Lebanon. Hezbollah is a powerful player in Lebanese politics.

Selective sanctions against Iran are doomed to fail, said Moniquet, "because Iran is completely opaque and there's no way of knowing where the money goes once it reaches Iran."

Iran's bilateral trade with China, meanwhile, stands at $45 billion, according to the Iran-China Chamber of Commerce. Neutral Switzerland, which is resisting U.S. and EU pressure to comply with 'The goal should be making it impossible for them. We are clearly not there yet' sanctions, is exporting about $330 million in machinery and pharmaceuticals per year to Iran.

Like many other countries, Turkey, China and Switzerland adhere – publicly, at least – to UN Security Council resolutions on Iran, but those target only Iranian entities directly involved in nuclear proliferation and human rights violations.

Nikzad Rahbar, an Iranian government spokesman, called European sanctions "a mere propaganda campaign."

Considering Iran's booming trade in Asia and elsewhere, the link between sanctions and Iran's spiralling inflation and rising food prices may not be as straightforward as presented by international media coverage, some argue.

"There is no way to break down how much of it is caused by sanctions and how much is the effect of economical incompetence, corruption and grafting that is so intrinsically a part of the Iranian economical system," Ottolenghi said.

Kortenoeven says that with Iran's decades of experience of getting by as a pariah nation, its economy cannot be neutralized by European sanctions. Though sanctions may be compounding the troubles, the economic woes in Iran ultimately are "connected to many internal issues," he said.

Moniquet cites poor management and a centralist, government-controlled market that discourages growth as the root of Iran's recent financial woes.

"The sanctions are only making it harder for Iran to transcend its internal problems, but not to the point of collapse," he said.

Simone Dinah Hartmann of the Vienna-based European coalition Stop the Bomb says the current sanctions make it more difficult for the Iranian regime to obtain nuclear weapons.

But, she said, "The goal should be making it impossible for them. We are clearly not there yet."

Activist sticks to his guns about al-Dura killing

Cnaan Liphshiz
JTA

To his allies, he's a bulldog. Enemies call him a conspiracist and a genocide denier.

Both sides, however, agree on one thing: one could find a more pleasant adversary than French-Jewish politician and activist Philippe Karsenty.

It's an impression easily reached in even a short conversation with Karsenty, the 46-year-old known in France for his 12-year battle to prove that a Palestinian boy, Mohammed al-Dura, was not shot and killed by Israeli soldiers as appears to be the case in a now-famous video first broadcast by a French television station.

Despite years of legal wrangling, public recriminations and high-profile setbacks, Karsenty remains unrepentant. He is utterly convinced of his rightness and won't stop until everybody else knows it, too.

Karsenty entered public life after he claimed that the footage of al-Dura crouching with his father behind a barricade as bullets whizzed overhead, broadcast by the France 2 television station in 2000, is in fact a hoax. The unsettling image of al-Dura's death emerged as an iconic and recurrent motif of the second intifadah, helping to galvanize public opinion against the Jewish state in the early days of the uprising and, many claim, spawning terrorist attacks against Israeli civilians and Jews elsewhere.

Karsenty claims the angle of the bullets hitting the wall behind the boy proves they could not have come from the Israeli side.

More than a decade into the fight, Karsenty, a stock broker and former businessman, acknowledges that the years of legal battle have taken their toll and exacted so high a financial cost that he refuses to fully reveal it.

Since Karsenty became involved with l'affaire al-Dura, his life has been transformed. He has launched a moderately successful political career, winning election as the deputy mayor of his prosperous Paris suburb, but failing in his bid for a seat in the French parliament. He split from his party, Nicolas Sarkozy's Union for a Popular Movement, accusing the former French president of being soft on jihadism. He has run afoul of officials of the very country he has sought to exonerate and been vilified in the French media. And he has waged a protracted legal fight, filled with suits and countersuits, to pressure France 2 to release extended footage that Karsenty says will prove the common assumptions about al-Dura's death are lies.

But through it all, Karsenty has remained undaunted, telling JTA that he has recently decided to double down and devote even more time and attention to "fighting the hoax."

"When I first saw the al-Dura footage I thought, like everyone, that Israeli troops killed the boy, probably by accident," Karsenty recalls.

Initially, Israel seemed to agree. But an Israeli investigation later found that the bullets likely came from Palestinian gunmen who exchanged fire with Israeli Defence Forces soldiers on the day al-Dura was shot. That probe, along with the work of independent investigators, gradually convinced Karsenty that France 2's footage was fake and he began saying as much to French journalists.

In 2004, the France 2 reporter who first broadcast the footage, Charles Enderlin, sued Karsenty for defamation and the two have been duking it out in court ever since. Their next court appearance is scheduled for January.

Meanwhile, rhetoric was overheating. Larry Derfner, writing in the Jerusalem Post this year, called Karsenty and Richard Landes "conspiracy freaks" acting out of "pure paranoia." Landes is a Boston University historian who has researched the al-Dura case with Karsenty and also believes the video is fake.

The Wall Street Journal reported that Enderlin's lawyer called Karsenty "a cross between Thierry Meyssan and Robert Faurisson," a Sept. 11 conspiracist and a Holocaust denier, respectively. Hundreds of French journalists signed a 2008 petition calling Karsenty's actions "hateful," and others have labeled him a conspiracist.

"The fact they call me, a French Jew, a genocide denier demonstrates the intensity of hatred that al-Dura provokes in the other side," Karsenty said.

For his part, Karsenty was hardly keeping quiet. He sued two other French media outlets for defamation, one of which led to a ruling in his favour in 2010. Another ruling found the broadcaster Canal+ to have committed libel against Karsenty, albeit unintentionally. His legal battle with Enderlin centers on the full 27-minute video that a France 2 cameraman, Talal abu Rahma, shot in Gaza and which the network has refused to release.

In 2008, Karsenty convinced a French court of appeals to view the full footage, after which the judges cleared Karsenty of defamation charges. Al-Dura skeptics hailed the ruling as a major breakthrough, but the French Supreme Court overturned that ruling this year on a technicality. Karsenty has appealed and will meet Enderlin in court again in January.

Karsenty also has attacked the country whose interests he was seemingly trying to serve. He has lambasted Israel publicly for its failure to press the al-Dura matter and accused some officials of trying to sabotage his efforts. Though Israeli officials largely agree with Karsenty's view on al-Dura, the government has distanced itself from him.

"Philippe is like a bulldog," Landes said. "He gets his teeth into something and he does not let go."

Questions began arising about the al-Dura video in the early 2000s, but it was Karsenty who "had the stamina to fight in court in France and in the French media," Landes said. Landes acknowledges Karsenty's occasionally "abrasive personality" has led to conflicts with potential allies.

In 2006, Karsenty claims that Daniel Shek, Israel's former ambassador in Paris, refused to shake his hand at a cocktail reception and publicly called him a "conspiracist." Shek denies the claim and accuses Karsenty of making "multitudes of mind-boggling and vile allegations and accusations" against him. Shek did not offer examples.

Yigal Palmor, a senior spokesperson for the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs, declined to comment directly on the incident.

"Maybe, just maybe, badmouthing people in public is not the best way to befriend them," Palmor said.

Karsenty, speaking of the dispute with Shek, said "I'm sure I haven't handled things perfectly. I'm not the perfect person. Nobody is. I've made mistakes, but none to explain why Shek would make such a public act. It shocked me."

Karsenty is not without allies, however. He has received support in the United States from the Zionist Organization of America, and Roger Cukierman, former president of the umbrella group of French Jewish communities, CRIF, said he holds Karsenty in high regard.

"I admire Philippe's devotion and perseverance," Cukierman said. "He has conviction that he's in the right. People like that, who are used to standing alone for what they believe in, often have very strong personalities that sometimes lead to clashes."

This year, Israelis again deeply disappointed Karsenty when he lost his bid to enter the French National Assembly as the representative of French expatriates residing in Israel and several nearby countries.

In his political career, Karsenty has demonstrated the same firebrand activism that appears to have alienated the Israelis. After leaving the UMP party last year, he accused Sarkozy of "inaction and passivity" on jihadism. Karsenty then ran for the French parliament as an independent and lost, deprived of the support and resources of his former party.

Karsenty intends to intensify efforts to refute the case

With the election behind him, Karsenty intends to intensify efforts to refute the al-Dura case.

"I have more time to devote to preparing for court," said Karsenty, who also lectures abroad on the topic.

Karsenty speaks of the al-Dura affair as a quest for justice and truth, but the businessman in him knows it has not been cost effective. Karsenty says he has spent an "obscene" amount of money—so much he will not quantify it. Though he earns some money from lectures he has delivered in Europe, the United States, China, India and Australia, he says he has still registered a huge loss.

He says he would let the matter drop were it not for the fact that so many, especially Israel's enemies, still believe al-Dura died at the hands of Jewish soldiers.

"The al-Dura myth lives on in the Arab and Muslim world," he said. Postage stamps memorializing al-Dura have appeared in Tunisia, Egypt, Iran and Jordan.

Despite the price it has paid, both in lives lost and public image, Israel refuses to endorse Karsenty's efforts.

"He has presented his work to a number of Israeli officials, including myself, but he has carried out his work by himself and has not garnered any official support," Palmor told JTA. "His work is his own."

The iconic Mohammed al-Dura poster

Nobel winner says French profs not anti-Israel

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

The recipient of the 2012 Nobel Prize in physics said he has never experienced antisemitism or witnessed anti-Israel bias during his long academic career.

Visiting Israel in late October, less than a month after taking home the world's top physics prize, Serge Haroche said he opposes an academic boycott of Israel.

"All the colleagues I know in this area are against such a boycott," said Haroche, who is French and Jewish. "Maybe there are some people in the humanities or the social sciences or political who are politically biased or translate their political beliefs into the scientific area. But I've never had anything of this kind."

However, the Moroccan-born Haroche, 68, acknowledged a rise in antisemitic attacks in France.

"This happens in the suburbs and is due to the unemployment of a lot of people from Muslim descent and the Palestinian situation," he told The Times of Israel during a reception at the residence of French ambassador Christophe Bigot. "But I must tell you that in the scientific area, I never had the slightest problem."

Science and Technology Minister Daniel Hershkowitz and Israeli scientist Ada Yonath, who in 2009 received the Nobel Prize in chemistry, also attended the event for Haroche, who has visited Israel many times.

Together with U.S.-based researcher David J. Wineland, Haroche won this year's Nobel Prize for "ground-breaking experimental methods that enable measuring and manipulation of individual quantum systems," according to the prize committee.

Haroche and his team were lauded for managing to capture and study a piece of light – a photon – without destroying it (the visible part of light is usually destroyed when it hits the eye).

"Through their ingenious laboratory methods, they have managed to measure and control very fragile quantum states, enabling their field of research to take the very first steps towards building a new type of super fast computer, based on quantum physics," the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences stated when they announced their decision to honour Haroche and Wineland. "These methods have also led to the construction of extremely precise clocks that could become the future basis for a new standard of time, with more than hundred-fold greater precision than present-day caesium clocks."

Born in 1944 in Casablanca, Haroche and his family – his father was a lawyer and his mother a teacher of Russian origin – moved to France in 1956, when he was 12. Haroche studied at the École Normale Supérieure under Claude Cohen-

Tannoudji, himself a Jew of North African descent, who won the Nobel Prize in physics in 1997. Haroche then entered the National Centre for Scientific Research in Paris and started teaching at École Normale Supérieure, as well as other universities such as Yale and Harvard.

Speaking to reporters, the soft-spoken Haroche rejected the assumption that his Moroccan-Jewish upbringing had anything to do with his academic success.

"The Nobel Prize and the research I conducted have no correlation with the fact that I was born in Casablanca nor with the fact that I love Israel and that I come here often," he said.

"Actually, the only connection one could see is with French culture, because it was in France where I was educated... That's what formed me."

Haroche's grandparents were the directors of a Jewish school in Morocco, he added. "They formed generations of young Jews."

Without getting into politics, he said he hoped that Israel would be able to solve its current problems, but added that he wasn't very optimistic regarding current developments.

Soviet aliyah pioneer reflects on Russia

Alina Dain Sharon
JNS.org

Yosef Mendelevich, whose memoir Unbroken Spirit: was translated into English this year led a Zionist movement of Soviet Jews who sought the freedom to immigrate to Israel, at a time when it was considered a treasonous act against the Soviet state. In 1970 he and a group of fellow Jews planned to hijack an airplane, escaping to Sweden and ultimately to Israel, but were arrested before the plan could be executed. Mendelevich was imprisoned, but efforts from abroad finally secured his release after 11 tough years in the Soviet Gulag. Afterward, he immigrated to Israel. JNS.org recently spoke with Mendelevich while he was visiting Boston.

JNS.org: Why did you decide to risk your life and attempt to escape the USSR to Israel by hijacking an airplane?

Yosef Mendelevich: It's important to remember that Latvian Jews of that generation were the first to assimilate because they became citizens of the Soviet Union only after World War II. I was born after the war in the Soviet Union, but my parents had had a different education. Nevertheless, my father was not a religious Jew and neither was my mother, and in my view this represented a larger process of stepping away from Judaism by all European Jews. I was born in a family that was not observant, but they at least knew some things about the traditions of the faith, and somehow that trickled down to me. The atmosphere was, therefore, still Jewish, similar in many ways to the atmosphere in secular American Jewish families that live with grandparents that speak Yiddish, and parents who are somehow connected and have been active in some Jewish cause. But the kids are not as connected to it, though they know some things. This is how I was.

The reality in the USSR was such that everywhere you were made to feel inferior as a Jew. There was one time at university, a group of students were standing around laughing and suddenly one of them says to me, "Wait, you're a Jew, right?" You were stigmatized, and that's very hurtful. So the other reason was self-respect. When the goyim ridicule you for being Jewish, you have two options. If you don't respect yourself, you fold and try to be like them. Or you say, "Yes, I am Jewish and I am not ashamed of it. On the contrary, it's an honour." It depends on the personality, and I do not like to be humiliated or be ashamed of who I am. It hurts my self-respect.

There was a process that led to the hijacking attempt. An underground Jewish movement evolved at a time when we felt like we already had one leg in Israel. Our whole thoughts and being were focused around the Jewish state. That was one of the big straws. I cannot say how it would have been before Israel's establishment, but we knew we had a country, a place where we felt we could be proud Jews. Also, during university, instead of listening to a lecture in thermodynamics, I would learn Hebrew. I wanted to learn about Jews and Judaism and to be among Jews. It was such a joy for me and still is to this day.

JNS.org: In what ways did Israel impress and/or disappoint you?

Yosef Mendelevich: I strove to come to Israel in order to be an active participant in the revival of the Jewish People in the State of Israel, with the understanding that there are many difficulties and problems, and I have something to do there. Perhaps if I had known that Israel is a paradise where there is nothing to do, I would not have had such a longing to go there. But I came there to fight, to change the status quo.

JNS.org: How did you feel when so many Russian Jews were finally able to make a home in the Jewish state?

Yosef Mendelevich: The Soviet immigration to Israel actually began much earlier. The day I made aliyah in 1981, more than 300,000 Jews left the USSR for Israel, which is already an impressive amount. Since 1990-91, every year more people came, but it was part of the same process. There were many people who also came not out of Zionist ideals, but just to escape the USSR. Many of them are returning to Russia today. In the end of the 1980s, the Israeli government asked the United States not to accept Soviet Jews as refugees because these people have a home and a country, which is Israel.

Our whole struggle had been for the right to make aliyah, not for the right to free immigration, but I still saw this move as hurting human freedom. Even though it may have been hurtful that before this agreement some of these immigrants used the permission to leave to go to the U.S. and not Israel, who are we to tell them how to live their lives? In the long term, I cannot say what was right.

In Israel, biotech is a woman's world

Abigail Klein Klosterman
Israel12ic

Women are the superstars of the vibrant Israeli biotech industry, filling leading roles as entrepreneurs, CEOs, funders and head researchers in this exciting field.

On the business side is a passel of chief executive officers packing PhDs, including Kinneret Savitsky of BioLineRx, Anat Cohen-Dayag of Compugen, Pnina Fishman of CanFit BioPharma, Einat Zisman of Hadassah Medical Organization, and Yael Margolin of Gamada Cell.

On the investment side are biotech veterans such as Ruth Alon of Pitango Venture Capital, Israel's largest fund of its kind; Mi-cha; Geva of TriVentures; Hadar Ron of Israel HealthCare Ventures; Anat Naschitz of OrbiMed; Dalia Megiddo of 7 Health Ventures; Elka Nir of Giza Venture Capital; Penina Safer of Medica Venture Partners; and Ronit Bendori of Evergreen.

On the academic side, there are members of the Scientific American 50, like Technion-Israel Institute of Technology biomedical engineering Prof. Shulamit Levenberg and Tel Aviv University microbiologist Prof. Beka Solomon.

Women comprise about 65 per cent of Israel's biotechnology workforce, and about 13 per cent of top management positions in companies listed on the Tel Aviv Biomed index.

"Women are more attracted to everything that has to do with people: social sciences or life sciences," says Technion industrial engineering and management Prof. Miriam Erez, head of Israel's National Council for the Promotion of Women in Science and Technology.

"Biomedical engineering has an element of life sciences, and what's happening these days is that academic researchers and research centers are becoming more multidisciplinary," Erez says, thus providing attractive opportunities for women in careers bridging engineering and life science.

"My prediction is that there will be more women in the future in areas considered to be male-dominated today."

Hamutal Meiri, 64, led the trend. After 16 years in academia, in 1991 she was asked to establish a national committee for coordinating Israel's nascent field of biotechnology, she says. Her goal was to turn scientific discoveries into a health-based industry.

"There was no infrastructure for an advanced biotechnological industry, and we had to build it," Meiri says.

Immediately, she saw women making it to the top as CEOs, CFOs and CTOs. "There were quite a number of role models women could follow," says Meiri, who now manages TeleMarpeh, a consulting firm involved in novel prenatal diagnostic technologies. "It's a smooth move from academia to industry, so women were there from the beginning and there was no barrier."

Galit Zuckerman
CEO of Medasense Biometrics

Galit Zuckerman, 34, agrees that her gender has never held her back. Founder of the four-year-old Medasense Biometrics, an Israeli company developing a non-invasive pain-monitoring device platform, Zuckerman previously led a team of algorithms engineers at Applied Materials, worked at Nokia-Siemens and Nice Systems, and consulted for several signal- and image-processing startups.

'Government wants Arabs to be in Israeli industry'

She was one of about 20 women in her class of 60 computer engineering students at Tel Aviv University. "In my master's program in electrical engineering there were even fewer women. But science and computers always interested me, and I was good at it."

After high school, she qualified for a prestigious program that trained her to do analytics in a military intelligence technology unit. That piqued her interest in engineering.

"I would encourage other women to go into engineering," says Zuckerman. "Specifically, the medical field is amazing — it combines so many worlds and you don't have a dull moment. You're always learning and exploring because there are so many opportunities and so many things to invent."

Career opportunities in Israeli biotech are a huge draw for the many women drawn to advanced life science study. As Zuckerman told Bloomberg News, "You have all these women with growing expertise in biology. It's only natural that they increasingly market that knowledge."

Many Israeli women in biotech say this field fit their areas of interest better than the similarly growing field of high-tech, and also more easily allows for combining a science career and raising children.

Compugen CEO Anat Cohen-Dayag.

Compugen's Cohen-Dayag, mother of two teenage girls, says high-tech startups are often founded by male army buddies after finishing college. Biotech requires advanced degrees, and many women find it easier to start a family while in school, before launching a career.

"In biotech, you can allow yourself time to raise a family because in general you have about 10 years before getting a PhD. Then you can move ahead," says Cohen-Dayag, who worked her way up the Compugen ladder for seven years before becoming its third and only female CEO.

A drug-discovery company, Compugen was male-dominated at first, says Cohen-Dayag. The gender proportion evened out when it came time to add biologists to the staff of computational scientists. "Today we integrate exact and life sciences half and half, and it's also 50-50 men and women," she says. Four out of the five top managers at Compugen are female.

Among the younger women making waves in biotechnology is 36-year-old Amal Ayoub, founder of Metallo Therapy, a startup developing gold nanoparticles to enhance radiation therapy. The first female Arab-Israeli high-tech entrepreneur, Ayoub at first wanted to study medicine until she became enchanted by physics.

Echoing the Technion's Erez, she explains: "I loved physics a lot and wanted to do something that connects physics and medicine." She found that connection in the bioengineering subspecialty of nuclear medicine.

She says her interests weren't unusual for a girl in her

Nazareth high school.

"A lot of Arab young women are interested in engineering and medicine," she says. "From a very young age I loved science and my teachers encouraged me to study it."

After finishing graduate studies at Ben-Gurion University, she couldn't find a suitable job for her skills and interests, so she founded a startup based on research she'd done for years on campus.

"Today it seems there are changes. The government wants Arabs to be in Israeli industry, so I think they will have more opportunities and fewer obstacles. I am a pioneer, and can be an example of a successful Arab woman who broke the glass ceiling."

MK forms pro-Israel Arab party

Philippe Assouline
The Times of Israel

It is hard to envisage an Arab Knesset member declaring that "if something were to happen to Israel, this democracy that protects everyone, the whole Middle East would be doomed."

But that is Aatef Karinaoui's declared conviction, and it explains why he is forming the first pro-Israel Arab party, El Amal Lat'gir - "Hope for Change" in Arabic - to run in the Knesset elections on Jan. 22, 2013.

Karinaoui gives the impression of a man who believes his time has come. A 42-year-old resident of the Bedouin city of Rahat in the Negev, he is a traditional Muslim but does not consider himself religious. Though involved in politics for nearly two decades, and exceedingly busy preparing his Knesset campaign, he is soft-spoken and patient. In fact, when we recently spoke, in a café at Ben-Gurion Airport, he repeatedly extended our chat to accommodate my questions - despite the nudging of his staff. And his anger at Israeli Arab politicians, who he says cultivate the division between Jewish and Arab Israelis, clearly runs deep.

"All the bad things they say about Israel and its supposed ill-treatment of Arabs is a lie, a bald-faced lie," he says intently, just moments after we've sat down. "Arab members of Knesset are setting a fire. They feed off of the politics of division and don't represent the Arab public. The Arab Knesset members do nothing to educate them or advance their situation... But [at present] there is no alternative to the current leadership."

By forming El Amal Lat'gir, which he says is loyal to Israel and concerned exclusively with social matters, Karinaoui aims to provide that alternative.

Karinaoui, who is married with five children (including a daughter currently on a national service program), is the chairman of the non-profit organization Social Equality and National Service in the Arab Sector, which encourages Arabs to shoulder a share of the national service burden. He's also in charge of operating computer centres in Arab cities throughout Israel as part of the Finance Ministry's Lehava project, whose goal is to "narrow the digital gap" by providing access to the Internet in lower-income areas of the country.

"We don't need the Arab members of Knesset to obsess over marginal matters and foreign affairs as they've been doing," he declares. Arab MK Hanin Zoabi participated in the May 2010 Mavi Marmara bid to break Israel's naval blockade of Gaza, for instance, while her colleague Ibrahim Saroor last year denounced the American "murder" of Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

"We have real, pressing concerns - 15 people living in a single house, land issues, education problems," says Karinaoui. "We have plenty to deal with. But [Arab MKs] distance us from the mainstream and don't want progress. Their leadership is the real failure."

Karinaoui believes that given the chance, he can make a real difference. "Our leaders have defrauded us for 60 years. Give us a single Knesset mandate, and we will do more for the people in four to five years than they have done in 60."

His Knesset bid is just getting off the ground, he says, asserting that information from his canvassing indicates his list could win five to six seats - an ambitious estimate, since Arab parties mustered just 11 seats between them in the outgoing Knesset. He is working flat-out building up the party, all day every day, he says, and is putting together a team of volunteers to go door-to-door in Arab towns and villages, planning advertising in Arabic papers, arranging speeches in mosques and building a website.

Karinaoui is currently working out of the northern towns of Sakhnin, Arabe and Tamra - none of them Bedouin towns, he stresses, underlining the goal to galvanize the entire Israel Arab community. Coming from a clan estimated to number some 8,000 makes for a good basis, he says.

But it's not just the perceived failure of Arab politicians to deliver that drives him: Karinaoui also very much identifies with the State of Israel. He wants to see Arab Israelis fully engaged as citizens, and taking responsibility for the change that they can bring about.

"We want to prove that we are loyal and faithful citizens," he says. "And we also need more attention and support from the state... I'm a proud Arab and a proud Israeli too. I'm not Palestinian... Look at Syria. Look at Egypt, look at Libya, look at Tunisia and look at Bahrain - the problem is not Israel, it's the Arabs."

Karinaoui's tack echoes a recent, widely circulated op-ed in which Abdulatef Al-Mulhim, a retired commodore of the Royal Saudi Navy, asked Arabs to stop pointing the finger at Israel. But Al-Mulhim doesn't live in Israel, a country where democracy comes hand in hand with Jewish symbols and mythology.

"I have no problem with the Star of David on the flag or with the national anthem - no problem at all," he says. "Israel is a democracy, and I respect every country that is a democracy. Israel did not expel me. I kept my land. I have the right under the law to do whatever I want to do, even to become prime minister."

"We Arabs need to thank God that we live in this democratic country."

Karinaoui volunteered for military service at the age of 26, and still completes his reserve duty whenever called, "because I am a citizen and I like it and this is what a citizen has to do."

In order to give his community a voice in government, Karinaoui joined the Likud Central Committee in 1995. Within a year, he became an adviser in Prime Minister Netanyahu's office, later advising Nathan Shtronsky at the Ministry of the Interior and Tzachi Hanegbi at the Environmental Protection Ministry, under Ariel Sharon's premiership. In the 2006 elections, he ran for Knesset in the utterly unrealistic 67th spot on the Likud list.

Why was he placed so low? Because the party ranks candidates on the basis of how many votes they'll likely draw, he acknowledges, and the fact is that few Israeli Arabs will vote Likud. But he showed, he says, that there was room for him even within the "nationalist" Likud tent, underlining the capacity to build what he calls an Arab voice from within. Karinaoui's straight talk can come across as refreshing in a political system that many in Israel consider steeped in excuses and evasions. And he sees in Israeli Arab politics the same pathologies - corruption and demagoguery - that triggered the Arab Spring.

"The voter turnout in the Arab sector in Israel is a mere 47 per cent... And of that 47 per cent, the majority are fake votes!" he asserts. "I am absolutely certain that [Arab Knesset members] receive money from foreign agents - maybe Iran, Hamas, [Hezbollah leader] Nasrallah, for instance. The state needs to investigate this. Where do they get all their assets and funding? These people come into politics with nothing, and suddenly they are driving fancy cars, they own land."

Karinaoui defends Israel as a democratic state

"It is exactly what is happening in the Palestinian Authority," he states, alluding to stories of deep-seated corruption in the ruling Fatah party. "The people are hungry, and these politicians get rich."

Noting my surprise at the fierce assertions, he adds: "I know this because I see it. I live it."

To change the way things are done, Karinaoui proposes co-operation. "What I want is to solve our problems here, as part of Israeli society, hand in hand with the Jewish public," he says.

Karinaoui has canvassed the Arab public's reaction to his ideas and found, he says, that Arab Israelis, who "currently see no hope," yearn for the kind of changes that he is proposing. He wants to embody that hope in the next Knesset. "In one month we can have a revolution, but we need help," he says, referring to the professional public relations team and infrastructure needed to conduct an effective campaign.

Karinaoui's call for co-operation with Israel is a departure from the rhetoric of current Arab Israeli politicians in Knesset, whose public identities are in large part Palestinian. "I am not Palestinian, that is nonsense," he says dismissively. "These Israeli Arab politicians who hold Israeli IDs – let them try to run for office in the Palestinian Authority. Let them see if the Palestinians and Abu Mazen [Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas] receive their candidacy as 'Palestinians.' They could be dead the next day."

Karinaoui is adamant about defending Israel's record as a democratic state – and in doing so he aspires to speak for the entire Arab community.

"Israel is a wonderful place for Arabs," he declares. "It is the only democracy in the Middle East. Look at what the Arabs are doing to each other all over the Middle East. We don't want to focus on that anymore here. People want to advance within the State of Israel, where they were born, and, yes, under the Israeli flag."

Rahat, the largest Bedouin city in Israel

Karinaoui stresses his conviction that rapprochement between Jewish and Arab citizens here will lead to benefits abroad as well as at home.

"If there is more co-operation between Arabs and Jews in Israel, we will broadcast that and fight the libel in the Middle East, to show the Arab public that we are part of Israel and proud of it, and that we get what we deserve," he argues. "This will bring immense benefits to Israel. And even the Iranians will have nothing to say."

As for the key issue of land ownership – a subject that regularly finds Israel's Bedouin, including those from his own hometown of Rahat, at bitter odds with the Israeli government, he says simply that such disputes cannot be solved through protests and violence, and certainly not by a resort to the brandishing of Palestinian flags. Change has to be achieved via peaceful means, he says. "In war mode, someone always loses."

Aside from avowals of gratitude and loyalty to Israel, nationalistic issues don't really concern Karinaoui. It's the growing wealth gaps in Israel and what he sees as inadequate Israeli Arab leadership that most bother him. And he considers those problems to be urgent.

"The real terrorism is not outside. It is our leadership," he says. "It is the crime, the poverty, the drugs and arms that plague our communities. It is Arab leaders teaching our kids to hate. That is the real terrorism. It is inconceivable that a young wife living in the Negev is separated from her husband all week because his only job is up north and hers is there, and yet that happens all the time. There are up to 12,000 teachers that are out of work," he continues, lamenting the joblessness rate even among the educated.

Karinaoui makes plain he wants the Jews to stay because, he says, "We want co-operation and the mixing of people and the development of businesses in our villages.... If we had the country that the present Arab leaders say that they want, we would have a situation like Syria here.... Why are they doing so much damage to our relationship with Jewish Israelis?"

"We need an Arab Spring here in Israel," he adds, "against our own Arab leaders."

Lessons from a gap year in Israel

Ariel Schnitzer

If it weren't for the Hebrew exit sign that hung above the entrance, I would have never imagined I was in Israel, or rather, the Israel that I had always known. Boys played soccer, girls gossiped in tight groups. The setting was very familiar – after all, I had only just been in high school myself a few months before. However, this was my first time in an Arab high school. I had come, as a component of my gap year program, to attempt to build relationships with Arab students and engage in dialogue that hopefully would better our understanding of one another.

Each year, many Jewish high-school graduates from all over the world spend a year studying in Israel. I was fortunate to be chosen to participate in "Kivunim: New Directions" through which I was able to live in Jerusalem and study history, politics, Hebrew and Arabic. We also visited many Jewish Diaspora communities in North Africa, Europe, and Asia to learn more about their history and modern status and, as North American Jews, to extend our support.

I had visited Israel before, but had never been exposed to its largest minority. I had spent two summers living with my cousins, returning home believing that I had fully experienced what it was like to live in Israel. I was excited, yet anxious to be part of the first meaningful interaction these Arab high-schoolers would ever have with their Jewish peers. That these kids were Israeli citizens, but most had never had any kind of relationship with another Jew, Israeli or foreign-born, shocked me. Awkward at first, our conversations soon turned amiable and uninhibited.

Kivunim's January trip took us to the Neve Shalom school in Casablanca. During a discussion about anti-semitism in Morocco today, Rabbi Jacquy Sebag drew our attention to a faint scar that divided his face into two. While walking down the street, he had been attacked by a person holding an axe who targeted him because he was Jewish. Today Rabbi Sebag continues to attend to the daily needs of the school. I couldn't believe that Rabbi Sebag was willing to resume his leadership role in the Jewish community after almost dying as a victim of a hate crime. I imagined a more logical response to be to flee as soon as possible to a safer community in Israel or the U.S. A minority in a Muslim country, Rabbi Sebag still views himself as Moroccan first. Despite the acrimonious Jewish-Muslim relations that permeate much of the world, he persists in engaging with the Muslim community. Reaching out as the majority to the minority, how different was it for me to channel Rabbi Sebag's dedication to working towards living peacefully with his neighbours into my own life? How could I better connect with the Ramle students who viewed themselves, rightly or wrongly, as victims of discrimination and distrust?

I returned to my regular Ramle visits with newfound energy. While we still conversed about generic interests: hobbies, school, and movies, we also discussed, extensively, both the Arab-Israeli conflict and the conflict between the Arab and Jewish citizens of Israel. Although I still identify as pro-Israel, I listened to the students argue their opinions and describe their encounters with prejudiced Jews and biased police officers. In turn, I hoped the Ramle students would acquire a new outlook on Jewish youth, and understand that some really did want to listen to them.

'Connecting with others begins with dialogue'

In addition to the lessons from my interactions with diaspora Jewish and Arab-Israeli communities, I learned that it was a personal struggle for me to stay organized. An adult now, I must take responsibility for every one of my mistakes. I was traveling to thirteen countries, so it is understandable that I got harried, packing and unpacking every few weeks. However, I did make a couple of trips to Western Union to withdraw cash when my wallet was stolen. I also called the phone company more than once because I had misplaced my cellphone, and several times I retraced my steps to retrieve whatever it was I had left behind. It is so easy to overlook the small details when I am busy thinking about long-term goals. If I don't carefully think out each action that I make, I can never hope to reach my larger ambitions. Lastly, I have recently begun a journal to help me keep track of my belongings as well as appointments and any noteworthy experiences.

This past year, I saw more than I could ever hope to in such a short time. I learned lessons that now alter the way I see the world and I discussed issues I had never shown interest in because they did not directly affect me or those close to me. I developed skills to tackle the new challenges of being an adult.

Most significantly, I learned that connecting with others begins with dialogue, which can generate more understanding and tolerance and hopefully increase the possibility of coexistence.

I never realized just how eye-opening my year in Israel would be. My advice to those taking a gap year this year or to those planning one in the future: enjoy every moment. And remember to keep an open mind. You never know who you might meet and, most importantly, what they will teach you.

Guidance at every turn

The sun doesn't always shine in Beit Shemesh

Lauren Izso
Special to The CJN

"Get back on the bus, shiksa," a boy yelled at the girl in denim.

Our bus was parked outside a haredi synagogue in Beit Shemesh, a small community near Jerusalem. We were a group of journalists looking to get the truth about this controversial neighbourhood.

A young female reporter dressed in jeans and a T-shirt and carrying camera equipment had raced off the bus to get a shot of the chaos that was beginning to ensue outside.

I waited to see if the reporter would let this get in the way of getting her story. She didn't, and her strength impressed me.

This media tour was held after an eight-year-old girl was spat at and harassed on her way home from school eight months ago for dressing "immodestly." Three women from Beit Shemesh wanted the world to know what life is really like in their small community, and one of the women was that eight-year-old girl's mother.

Our bus was like a secular bubble travelling through an ocean of the extreme.

"Shiksa" is a Polish term that refers to a non-Jewish female, which in this case was untrue and intended to be offensive. I realized that women who do not conform with haredi dress code are not only unwelcome by this community, but are also considered to be unworthy of being Jewish altogether.

I took a deep breath and walked down the steps of the bus to join the crowd. My heart began to race. I was in direct view of many haredi men and boys. I thought they would do everything in their power to prevent non-Orthodox Jews like me from disrupting the harmony of their exclusive community.

Journalists were snapping pictures and filming interviews amid the madness. They were trying to get pictures of a sign posted on the synagogue door that said in Hebrew, "No Women Allowed." There were signs like that all over the neighbourhood.

I noticed the crowd was getting larger. A sea of black and white, members of the community, stared at us with disapproving, disappointed looks. I couldn't help but feel guilty. Were we portraying them in a bad light? Were we only getting half the story? This is every journalist's worst fear.

The door swung open atop the grand staircase that led up to the synagogue, and an elderly, overweight man stepped. He shot us a piercing glare. My guilt dissipated, and my heart once again began to race.

"Leave immediately," the rabbi shouted.

Silence came over the crowd as one by one each head snapped toward him to listen to his sermon.

"How dare you come here and disturb our peaceful learning with your nonsense? This is a sin, and God will punish you for this," said the rabbi.

He stood atop the stairs nobly, as if he were Moses delivering the words of God to the Israelites. However, the young haredi men were the Israelites, and we were the enemy. He scanned the crowd of story-hungry journalists with his squinty-eyed glare and raised his hands in the air, as if he was about to announce the moral to his holy sermon.

"Death is upon you. You will all drop like flies for this," he said.

This animosity was something I did not expect on this beautiful day in Beit Shemesh, the place where the sun is always supposed to shine. I was not afraid, but more intrigued and curious to find out whether his views were truly shared by this religious community and perhaps others as well.

It was difficult for me to understand how Jews could treat one another with such disdain. Isn't the Jewish religion supposed to embody acceptance and a sense of community? I felt many things that day, but acceptance was not one of them.

It is hard to believe that in such a family oriented and tight-knit community based on loving God, there should be such hatred. There must be some reasoning, some biblical explanation, I thought.

Hopes for day when 'Jews will accept one another'

We then tried to find haredi women to interview. We approached a group of women pushing strollers. Every inch of their bodies was clothed and not a strand of their hair was exposed. At least three microphones were thrust at their faces. Then one woman stepped forward.

"Do we come into your homes and tell you how to dress?" she asked. "We will not be a part of this interview. Mind your own business."

To this day, I wonder if she would have spoken at all had her husband been present.

Why do these women obey a dress code and signs that tell them where to walk, just because men tell them this is the way of God? Why must there be so much conflict among the Jewish People, when there is already so much conflict surrounding us?

There is much I fail to understand about Judaism, and observing the people of Beit Shemesh only left me with more questions. For now, all I can do is continue to wonder when the day will come that Jews can accept one another, no matter their style of dress or gender. I will never stop searching for answers because, above all, that is truly the basis of the Jewish religion – asking questions.

Hebrew media struggling; Israeli English press booming

Ben Sales
ITA

On Oct. 17, seven Israeli English news websites led with seven different stories.

The Jerusalem Post had a piece on Egypt's commitment to its treaty with Israel. Ha'aretz's English site ran with a recently released Israeli document on Gaza. Ynet News, Yedioth Achronon's English site, led with threats to a retired Israeli security chief. Then there were The Times of Israel, Israel Hayom's English edition, Israel National News, and -972 (972mag.com), a popular news and commentary blog.

Twenty years ago, only one of these seven publications existed: The Jerusalem Post. Two of the sites, Israel Hayom English and the Times of Israel, are less than three years old.

While Hebrew newspapers and TV channels are struggling, English-language news appears to be booming. But with the business of journalism under threat worldwide due to declining revenues, Israel's English-language media face an uncertain future.

"We see an explosion of new media because online platforms are cheap and easy to use," said Noam Sheizaf, CEO of +972. "We couldn't have done +972 four years ago. The Times of Israel would have been a much more expensive operation five years ago."

The past few months have been cruel ones for Hebrew-language media. Ma'ariv, a tabloid founded in 1948 and for its first 20 years Israel's largest circulation daily, was recently placed in the hands of a court-appointed trustee and could shut down within weeks, leaving 2,000 people jobless. Ha'aretz, Israel's leading broadsheet, did not print on Oct. 4 due to a staff protest of 100 proposed layoffs. Israel's Channel 10 TV is in deep debt to the government and faces possible closure.

Many in Israel blame Israel Hayom, a free conservative newspaper founded in 2007 by American casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, for aggravating the crisis.

"We have the most generously funded free newspaper in the world," said The Times of Israel founding editor David Horovitz, which has "exacerbated" the Hebrew-media crisis. Before starting The Times of Israel site in February, Horovitz was editor in chief of The Jerusalem Post. "That's made life hard for all the publications in Israel."

The boom in English-language media in Israel is due in part to the limited audience for Hebrew-language news: Israel has fewer than 8 million citizens, many of whom prefer the Arabic or Russian press to the Hebrew dailies. Editors of English publications here say Israeli media are looking for audiences overseas to sustain their operations, and there appears to be a limitless appetite around the world for news and opinion on Israel.

"There's an audience for news coming out of the Jewish world," said David Brinn, managing editor of The Jerusalem Post. And because most news content is free online, people interested in Israel news will visit any number of news sites - so new publications do not necessarily threaten older ones, Brinn said.

Much of the growth of Israel's English media has been online. Ha'aretz, Ynet News, Israel National News and Israel Hayom all translate their Hebrew reportage while weaving in some original English reports.

In May, Ha'aretz, the only one of the Hebrew papers to have an English print edition, put up a pay wall on its popular English website, charging digital subscribers $100 annually for unlimited access. It's still uncertain whether the strategy will pay off, though the pay wall experiment will be expanding soon to the Ha'aretz Hebrew site, too.

"It's unrealistic to rely solely on a print model to fund our journalistic operation," said Charlotte Halle, editor of Ha'aretz's English edition. "We wouldn't be taking care of our journalistic future if we didn't seek additional sources of income."

Halle said the paper's "authority, breadth of coverage, and dozens of reporters and editors...in the field" have attracted thousands of digital subscribers.

The Jerusalem Post has pursued additional revenue from a range of publications beyond its daily newspaper: international, Christian and French editions - all produced, along with the daily, by just 60 employees. Most of the paper's readers are online - the Post says it garners some 2 million hits per week.

The Times of Israel, which combines original reporting with articles that repackaged information from Israeli TV, radio and news sites, would not disclose readership statistics. But Horovitz says the site is exceeding expectations and has garnered 40,000 "likes" on Facebook since its launch eight months ago.

Horovitz says the publication's "nonpartisan agenda" stands in contrast to the right-leaning Post and left-leaning Ha'aretz. The news coverage seeks to strike an unbiased tone, he says, while hundreds of bloggers, all unpaid, opine on a range of topics - from Iran's nuclear program to the morality of circumcision.

"We strive to tell it like it is," Horovitz said. "People want to know what's going on, and they don't want to feel like it's filtered through some political agenda."

With a crowded market and challenging times for the news industry, Israel's English-language journalists are not without trepidation about the future. "There will be some sort of re-evaluation" of The Post print newspaper's viability in a few years, Brinn said.

Beyond competing for readership, print publications must vie with an ever-expanding cyber universe that occasionally breaks stories before they do.

"Social media has served to democratize the media market in Israel," said Avi Mayer, the Jewish Agency for Israel's director of new media and a prolific tweeter of Israel news. "When people share information through Twitter, it is a personal experience."

While many Israeli journalists have become active tweeters, +972's Sheizaf worries that publications that are thriving now are resistant to change, which could hurt them in the future.

"People are not experimenting," he said. "The readers are evolving and changing but the journalists, the stories they write, look like the stories written in the 19th century. We need to be a lot more creative."

An A+ Israeli app for school

Viva Sarah Press
Israel21c.org

Writers block for professionals is one thing. But when a student can't think of how to start an assignment or doesn't know how to fine-tune an Internet search, schoolwork can quickly turn from educational to frustrating.

That's where a new Israeli startup called Skills & Knowledge comes in. The company has created an application known as sCoolWork, which helps students write essays better and faster.

"As soon as you're being tasked with writing something, that's where we kick in," Shachar Tal, Skills & Knowledge vice-president of marketing, tells Israel21c. This isn't a tool for cheating, but an organizational aid to format an assignment, spellcheck it, check grammar, put in a bibliography and even search the Internet more effectively.

The app has the potential to substantially influence how people in general, and students specifically, process information, and it is teacher approved.

"Making sure that line-spacing is double at all time, changing the font back when Word changes it for you - these are tasks forced upon us because of software that is incompatible with the needs of students," explains Tal. "Teachers widely agree that these tasks are a hindrance and waste a lot of time. These are really garbage tasks. If they're automated, it's a blessing for all."

The idea for the schoolwork application popped into Alexander Dayan's head when his elder son, now 16, asked for help with his homework. There are many online resources for writing an essay, Dayan says, but he never found a tool like sCoolWork. Dayan, who has led projects from the idea stage to successful products at ELTA Systems and Check Point Software Technologies, decided to create what he felt was missing in the marketplace. The idea came to him in May 2010. By the end of the year, he had a prototype in its early stages. Tal joined Dayan in early summer 2011.

The beta version of sCoolWork is free and has received positive feedback.

"sCoolWork is a great app for any student who is tasked with writing research papers in the MLA (Modern Language Association), APA (American Psychological Association) or Chicago (Manual of Style) style formats. These formats can seem overwhelming at times for newer students, and this app helps walk these students through the process of setting up their papers and not getting marked down for something as 'irrelevant' as a formatting issue," according to an AppAppeal review. For now, the app is available in English only, but Spanish, Portuguese, German, French, Russian and Hebrew versions will be developed.

Skills and Knowledge recently sponsored New York's #14edu event, which explores that state of education.

American teachers and educators at the conference were not surprised that an Israeli startup was behind the technology.

"They were very aware that Israel is a startup empire and were very happy to see us. No one had a problem that we're from a country where English is not the official language. Language is not a barrier. The idea here is the technology," says Tal. The choice of English and directing the product at the American market was deliberate.

"We chose English because we're very avid advocates of English as a second language. English as a globally connecting language," explains Tal. "We chose the U.S. because we saw a lot of passion for education there. We wanted the best market for us to share our experience."

Tal says an annual subscription will likely cost $40 to $80 (Cdn), but those who cannot afford the program will be able to get it free through their educators.

"We share the same passion," says Tal, adding that most of the capital to date comes straight from Skills & Knowledge founder Dayan's pocket. "And we share the same social responsibility."

Artist paints scenes of life in South Africa

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

When Romi Samuels, 45, emigrated from South Africa about 12 years ago, most of the links with her birthplace were severed.

"I had no immediate family there, so my ties were really broken. It was very odd just to have memories," she said in a recent interview.

She has kept the country alive however, through her oil paintings of South African people and scenes.

A French teacher at Ulpianat Orot High School For Girls, where her husband Frank is principal, Samuels, a mother of three, said she had never really considered herself an artist.

"Art is not new to me, though. My mother was an artist and art critic, so art has always been in the family. I have her paintings, and she inspired me. I wanted to emulate her."

She began painting here, she said. "I took some classes and I devoted myself to something I love. It became part of my life."

"I paint only African subjects because I live here. I am reliving my earlier life, and it was wonderful. There was poverty, unemployment and crime, though, and I didn't want to bring up my family there. It is a wonderful country, but you can't be relaxed."

Her paintings, all done in oil paint, come from a combination of photographs, memories and feelings, she said.

"I reconnect with who I once was and where I once was. The paintings encompass various aspects of one place. I feature black people, because there is a huge black population, and they are the people that populate the streets."

As a Jew, she said, she understands what it is like to be discriminated against, "so by painting black people, I am giving them the opportunity to occupy centre stage of the canvas rather than be sidelined. I paint them with dignity and in the spirit of friendship."

She divides her paintings into three areas, she said. "The first is the city, which is vibrant and bustling. There are shopkeepers, hawkers, and fruit and craft vendors. You can feel the energy, but you also feel a sense of lurking danger. It is an exciting place."

The suburbs, she said, are completely different. "The communities are gated, and there are no children playing in the streets. The streets are full, though, of domestic workers and gardeners."

"It's a different life there. There are lots of servants and maids, and they exude such friendliness and warmth. They are the people who brought us up."

She painted a picture of her family's longtime nanny, she said, "and she was so excited with it. I gave it to her when I visited there."

Romi Samuels with one of her works

Her paintings also reflect struggles of everyday people, she said.

"There is a lot of poverty. You see women begging, with babies on their backs. There is an unbelievable struggle for survival, but there is no sense of resentment."

A half hour away from the suburbs, said Samuels, are the rural areas, "and South Africa is full of open areas of dry grass with lots of dusty roads, and ragged and bare-foot children playing in the streets."

"You have a blazing sun and blue skies, and there is low-lying shrubbery, with a few cows and goats grazing nearby."

This rural area penetrates her soul, she said. "There is a rugged beauty to it."

One of Samuels' favourite paintings is of a family walking home from church in a rural area.

"They are using umbrellas to protect themselves from the broiling sun, and they're all wearing church outfits - white tunics and blue pants."

When she paints, she loses all track of time. "I start with charcoal and then work with oil over the charcoal. Sometimes it is a struggle, and sometimes it is as if there is a hand guiding me. Those are the paintings I like the most."

"Painting keeps me sane. It is a total escape from everyday life."

Her paintings hang throughout her house, but she has never exhibited them publicly. "I've just never gotten around to it."

Farsi album garners Iranian fan base for Israeli singer

Chavie Lieber
JTA

It's not every day an Israeli wakes up to an email inbox full of love letters from Iran. Yet they come in droves to Israeli singer Rita Yahan-Farouz.

The 50-year-old Iran native, who performs under the name Rita, is arguably Israel's most popular female entertainer. She has put out 12 albums since hitting the Israeli music scene in 1985, many of them going platinum on the country's charts.

Rita's latest album, My joys, is sung in Farsi, in which she is fluent. By including old folk tunes from Iranian culture, like the traditional Persian wedding song Shah Doomad, Rita has won legions of listeners in a land whose leaders regularly call for her adopted country's demise.

"You wouldn't believe some of the emails I get from people in Iran," Rita says laughingly during a phone interview with JTA while traveling from Los Angeles to San Francisco as part of her U.S. tour through mid-November.

"They tell me how much they love me and how much they love Israel."

Rita describes her musical vibe as a

"gypsy band," infusing classic Mediterranean spirits of complex percussion rhythms and upbeat tempos with unusual instruments of the genre like woodwinds, ouds and violins.

Growing up in Tehran under the Shah's rule, Rita remembers a vibrant childhood filled with Persian music. Still, the family kept their Jewish identity a secret from neighbour. In 1970, when Rita was eight, her family moved to Israel.

"My sister came home from school one time in tears because her teacher asked her to recite a Muslim prayer in front of the class. The teacher was shocked when she didn't know it," Rita recalls. "After that incident, my father decided we should leave Iran."

Rita says she has dreamed of creating an album that could serve as a bridge between two countries that have seen nothing but tension in recent years.

"The songs on my album in Farsi are the soundtrack of my childhood," she says. "My mother had a beautiful voice and was always singing these traditional songs to me, even when we were in Israel, so there was always a piece of Iran in me. There's more to the region than violence, bombs and darkness, and I want to share the rich culture I am a part of."

Rita Yahan-Farouz

Since Iran's Internet is heavily censored by the government, Rita's album is sold on the black market, fans have told her. But her music is played at weddings and nightclubs in Iran, and she says her fans love the fact that she's Israeli.

Rita says the power of music has already created a dialogue with the people of Iran. Many who email her write that they don't hate Israelis and want nothing more than to hear her perform.

"I'm completely in love with your voice – you have no idea how hard it was to send you this email!" one fan writes. "My wish is that one day I can see you perform in Israel – even if this means that upon returning to Iran, I would have to be beaten, and imprisoned for three years."

And another: "I'm writing you from Shiraz in Iran and just wanted to tell you that you're a source of great pride for us. The beautiful and emotional songs you sing in this time of war, this crazy time of Islamic control gives an overwhelming feeling of closeness and love between the countries of Iran and Israel. I ask from the great and merciful God to send you happiness and health."

Rita is happy that she can send positive messages about Israel to the rest of the world and would like to perform in Iran.

"There's a good chance I will perform in Iran very soon, as soon as the borders are easy to open," she says. "I have a strong connection to the people of Iran, and it would send an incredible message."

New documentary reveals unknown story of 'orchestra of exiles'

Elisa Spungen Bildner
ITA

This is the Holocaust story you don't know. Almost guaranteed.

Bronislaw Huberman, a Polish-Jewish violin prodigy from the late 19th into the 20th century, is the protagonist, joined by familiar names such as Albert Einstein and the acclaimed non-Jewish conductor Arturo Toscanini. It is the tale of the founding in 1936 of what would become the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra and of how Huberman, its founder, saved more than 1,000 Jews in the process.

Orchestra of Exiles, a new documentary produced, written and directed by Oscar-nominated filmmaker Josh Aronson, tells the saga, which is almost unknown outside of Israel.

No book in English chronicles the story, which Aronson assembled primarily from the violinist's archives in Tel Aviv.

Even Aronson, a concert pianist himself and married to a professional violinist, had never heard of Huberman when he was approached by a musician friend who said she had a terrific idea for a movie.

"As a documentary filmmaker who has made more than one film, this happens often. Usually, it's someone telling you about a family drama, or a dull little story ... You are always very polite," Aronson said in an August interview with WAMC Northeast Public Radio.

"Bronislaw who? I have no idea what you are talking about," Aronson recalls telling the friend, Dorit Grunschlag Straus, when she broached the topic of a documentary about Huberman's pre-World War II heroics.

Yet because of Huberman, Straus' father, Viennese violinist David Grunschlag, survived the Holocaust along with his parents and two sisters, when Huberman guaranteed him passage out of Europe to play in a world-class orchestra of exiles he was assembling in Palestine.

"In a cultural 'aha moment' that would change the course of history, Huberman saw the opportunity to both save Jews and to found the orchestra that would become the great Israel Philharmonic," Aronson said.

Huberman, who launched his European career at the age of 12, playing the Brahms Violin Concerto before the composer himself, had played before heads of government, kings, princes – in those days, says Aronson, top society lionized classical musicians. Through this privileged access, he learned of the threat that Hitler's rise posed to Germany, as well as the reticence of other nations to intervene diplomatically.

When musicians were fired in Germany after Hitler came to power in 1933, Huberman acted, influenced by his own brushes with Polish antisemitism in the 1880s and the Zionist inkings of Einstein, a fellow violinist who later helped him raise funds for the orchestra.

Huberman saved lives

Cancelling all of his engagements in Germany – he never returned – Huberman dedicated himself to convincing the most accomplished Jewish musicians in Europe to relocate and create an orchestra in the Tel Aviv desert.

"One has to build a fist against anti-semitism," Huberman says in the film. "A first-class orchestra would be that fist."

From 1934 to 1936, he auditioned, he accepted, he turned down musicians. In his homeland of Poland, Huberman conducted blind tryouts to assure himself that his choices would be based solely on musicianship.

"It would be a misnomer, though," cautions Aronson, "to say he was in a godlike position." One can't look at history in hindsight, he says: no one, including Huberman, foresaw concentration camps, and Jews were used to the vicissitudes of anti-semitism.

Toscanini entered the story after he refused to honour a playing engagement in Germany which he had accepted before Hitler's ascent. When Huberman learned of the maestro's principled resistance to fascism, he immediately asked him to conduct the opening concerts in Palestine, which Toscanini did.

The de facto leader of the Jewish community in 1930s Palestine, David Ben-Gurion, also played a role in this drama – but not a supporting one.

In 1936, Huberman clashed with Ben-Gurion over bringing the 70 musicians and their families because Ben-Gurion would only extend temporary entry documents to them rather than the precious permanent ones they so desperately needed. Ben-Gurion believed that only workers would build Israel, not these performers, urbanites who would get off the boat, take one look at the camels and sand, and make a beeline back.

World Zionist leader Chaim Weizmann intervened and the Palestine Symphony held its first concerts in December 1936.

For Aronson, who calls himself a classic twice-a-year Jew, the project offered the opportunity to immerse himself in Holocaust history, something he had never done. It's not that he grew up in a family that was unaware. His father, Aronson says, would never set foot in Germany and didn't like the fact that his son owned a Volkswagen.

But for the year he researched Huberman and the Israel Philharmonic, Aronson read books he had never read, explored Yad Vashem and the Holocaust museum in Washington.

"I gave myself the education on this painful topic that I was too intimidated to go after years ago," Aronson said.

Aronson says that in producing the documentary, he was fortunate to meet the aristocracy of Israel – the octogenarians who saw Zionism at its beginnings – as well as musicians who create music today at the highest levels. Among those interviewed for the film were artists such as Itzhak Perlman, Joshua Bell, Pinchas Zukerman and Zubin Mehta. (I won't spoil a final anecdote: Good story embedded in the movie about Bell, whose violin teacher worshipped Huberman.)

In the end, how many Jews did Huberman save? Aronson suggests about 1,000, but notes that some Israelis claim it was closer to 3,000 after tallying players, parents, wives and others swept along.

There are no records, he says, since Huberman didn't need or want accolades.

"He was doing this because he saw intolerance and, unlike so many who did nothing, felt compelled to act," Aronson said. "Maybe because he had such a big heart."

Composer carries Jewish history on his shoulders

Maxine Doveve
JNS.org

Noaam Sheriff, conductor of the Haifa Symphony Orchestra and 2011 winner of the Israel Prize (largely regarded as the state's highest honour) in music, believes decades of experience gives him a unique perspective on major prizes.

"If I were 20 or 30, the excitement would be overwhelming," 77-year-old Sheriff, one of Israel's leading conductors, said in a recent interview with JNS.org just before his composition, Mechaye Hametim (Hebrew for Revival of the Dead), was performed by the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in New York.

"Now, I see things from a different angle – a different kind of excitement. One is the feeling that, on my shoulders, I carry a very long history of the Jewish People. It does not matter from where they come – Poland, Germany, Morocco, Syria, Russia, Iraq – they are Jewish people."

The Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, under the baton of conductor Zubin Mehta, presented Sheriff's symphony during a historic program that included three major compositions, all written by composers of Jewish heritage at its gala concert Oct. 25. Arnold Schoenberg's Kol Nidre and Felix Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1 in G Minor, but Sheriff's composition, Mechaye Hametim, commissioned by a Dutch Holocaust survivor as a memorial to Jews murdered in the Holocaust, was the headliner.

Following the concert that evening, speaking from a balcony at the Plaza Hotel in New York, Mehta greeted and warmly thanked members of the American Friends of the Israel Philharmonic (AFIPO). Mehta, who is celebrating more than 50 years as conductor and musical director of the orchestra, was exuberant. "In New York, even in Beijing, we are reaching the people," he said.

The afternoon before the gala event, Sheriff spoke with JNS.org about the interplay of music and language, and of music and philosophy. "A composer," he said, "sometimes is expected to act like a composer."

What does that mean, exactly?

"Absent-minded, impractical, a wild look, perhaps a red scarf – like other artists! But composers always look like bank officials – very square... Musicians, classical musicians, are not people of small talk," Sheriff said.

In July 2012, the Mechaye Hametim composition was played during the opening performance of what Sheriff termed the "shrine" of classical music, the Salzburg Festival in Austria. Sheriff marvelled at how "unexpectedly well" the "very selective Salzburg audience" received his music.

"If this work was accepted by the keen musicologists of Salzburg, approved and recommended, it is something which transcends nationality and becomes universal," he said. "That is my main concern – not about myself, but about all that is known as Jewish music – not only klezmer music or melodies of the hazanim [cantors]."

Months after Salzburg, on the day of the symphony's Carnegie Hall debut, Sheriff's excitement was palpable. He expressed gratitude to New York Times music critic James R. Oestreich, whose review, titled "A new faith in classical music", appeared on the paper's front page.

Sheriff told JNS.org that Mechaye Hametim "is a portrayal of the Jewish People" and offers a melodic narrative of Jewish history, including Diaspora Jewish life before the Holocaust and the Holocaust itself, as well as Jewish revival and renaissance in Israel. The Israel Philharmonic Orchestra premiered the piece in Amsterdam in 1987.

Hebrew language 'actually looks like a miracle'

"For me, it is subjective – like closing a circle," Sheriff said. "Gustav Mahler. I believe the greatest Jewish composer, practised conducting in New York. In Mahler's compositions, you find the quintessential element of what I understand is being a Jew."

With a bit of laughter, he added: "Being a conductor and a composer is very Jewish... I am speaking of composing and conducting as two sides of the same coin. In the end, it is the composition that remains. Yet, it will stay dormant on paper – it needs someone to bring it to life."

Sheriff is deeply engaged in Judaism. About the Jewish state, he said, "To me, it was always Israel. I was born in Israel [in 1935]. I grew up in Israel. Israel is where I live... First I am a Jew, second I am Israeli."

He continued, "Being a Jew is not only a religion or a nationality. It is the yearning to achieve another dimension, trying to combine the dualism built in nature – the physical and the spiritual of the human being. This is not easily understood... For me, the senses are built so that you can combine them to give a virtual third dimension. Each sense contributes something different."

Referring to the physical, he noted that, "The dichotomy is reflected in the two hemispheres of the brain. When the brain is in perfect harmony, another dimension Conductor Zubin Mehta, centre, and composer Noam Sheriff, right, on stage at Carnegie Hall in New York following the gala concert of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. sion is achieved."

Sheriff called the Hebrew language "something that actually looks like a miracle." He spoke about its influence on the creation of music.

"It is a language that came back to life – something extremely rare," he said. "Little children speak the language of the Bible... Language is the territory of the Jewish People, not only land. The real place of a nation is where its language came to life. Music has to be based in language. In this respect, I write my music from the very ancient bases."

When Sheriff was awarded the Israel Prize in 2011, he said he "had no feelings at all." After 50 years teaching conducting, "they made it official," he said of the honour.

"I know how [teaching music] should be done. The knowledge of the theoretical – of music, notes and the technical part – is only 50 per cent. The other 50 per cent is a question of personality and idiosyncrasies."

The conductor speculated that perhaps he did not have a strong reaction to the Israel Prize because he was "spoiled," recalling moments such as "being in the limelight with 'Lenny' Bernstein at the 1957 opening of the Mann Auditorium in Tel Aviv [when Sheriff's Festival Prelude made its premiere]."

JNS.org also asked Sheriff for his thoughts about politics and peace.

"Scher tsu zein a Yid [it's difficult to be a Jew]," he said. "I've been through five wars [in Israel]. One cannot hold a dialogue unless one creates the ground for a common terminology and defines the terms. Words are very important. They are vehicles of thinking – points of knowledge that influence a pattern of thinking. All I wish now is good health and clearness. Will there be peace? I don't know what is peace."

SWEET POTATO LATKES

From the kitchen of Moti Buchbut, executive chef, Inbal Jerusalem Hotel (www.inbalhotel.com)

2 1/4 lbs. sweet potatoes pinch of salt
pinch of pepper
1 1/2 cups (7 oz.) all-purpose flour
2 tbsp. spicy chili sauce
1 medium egg oil to fry

Wash sweet potatoes thoroughly and place on a baking tray. Bake at 300 degrees for approximately 40 minutes, until soft.

Cool and peel. Place in a colander to cool completely and remove excess liquid.

In a bowl, mash potatoes until they become a smooth puree. Add remaining ingredients.

Heat a frying pan with the oil and drop latkes onto hot pan from two tablespoons or a pastry bag.

Fry 3 minutes on each side and serve warm on a bed of apple sauce with a ball of cream cheese.

Serving suggestions:

You can also serve on a platter alongside potato latkes.

Latkes can also be served with seasonal fruits such as mango and pineapple.

ENGLISH CAKE WITH CHOCOLATE AND DRIED FRUITS

From the kitchen of Moti Buchbut, executive chef, Inbal Jerusalem Hotel (www.inbalhotel.com)

Cake

1 3/4 sticks (7 oz.) butter or margarine
1 cup brown sugar
4 medium eggs
1 3/4 cups (7 oz.) finely chopped dried fruits and nuts (such as cherries, apricots, almonds, walnuts etc.)
1 1/2 cups (7 oz.) flour
1/4 cup sweet red wine
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. vanilla extract
pinch of salt

Decoration

3 1 2 squares (3.5 oz.) bittersweet chocolate (place an extra ounce aside for final garnishing) thinly sliced seasonal fruits (such as apple, pineapple, pear etc.)
icing sugar
Optional: pareve whipped cream, amaretto liquor

Cake

Preheat oven to 350 degrees. Line pan(s) (use two 7x7-inch pans or one larger 14x14-inch pan) with baking paper.

In a bowl, combine flour and baking powder. Beat butter / margarine and sugar in food processor until creamy. Add eggs, wine, salt, and vanilla, alternating with flour mixture. Process until smooth and fluffy.

Remove from the food processor and fold in the dried fruits & nuts. Pour mixture into lined baking pan(s) and bake at 350 degrees for 35 minutes.

Cool. Using a thin knife or round cookie cutter, cut into 2-inch circles.

Decoration

Melt chocolate in a double-boiler over boiling water and pour onto a sheet of baking paper. Spread thinly. Leave to cool and harden at room temperature.

When chocolate has hardened, cut out circles slightly larger than cake circles.

Brush cakes with a little amaretto liquor if desired, then place chocolate circles on top of cakes (optional: stick chocolate ring to the cake with a little cream).

Dry seasonal fruit by placing on baking paper, sprinkling with a little icing sugar and covering with another sheet of baking paper. Bake at 160 degrees for approximately 40 minutes or until dry.

Stick dried fruit to the chocolate circles by dipping first in a little melted chocolate.

To serve: sprinkle with icing sugar and add a dollop of a sweet fruity sauce on the side.

How to make kosher mulled wine

Anna Harwood
 Special to The CJN

I think back to my high school days growing up in London, England, when my whole family would trek on a Saturday night to watch the school fireworks display. We would arrive and be greeted by the sounds of fireworks whizzing above us and the comforting smell of steaming hot, mulled wine filling the air.

Mulled wine, according to Irène Sharon Hodes of the Golan Heights Winery, dates back to Greek and Roman times when herbed, spiced, and sweet wines were much favoured.

"Throughout European history, in countries where winter brings a cold chill, there has been a tradition of making hot, spiced and often strong wines. Some recipes that have been discovered date from as early as the 14th century," Hodes explains. "All recipes have a base of a light dry red wine and then sugar, or in some cases honey, is added."

"This mixture is complemented by spices such as cinnamon and cloves, as well as citrus fruits, which vary from country to country. Sometimes mulled wines are fortified with rum, brandy, port, or cordial. In England, there was a tradition of caramelizing the fruits first, whereas in France they prefer to keep the wine less sweet."

As an observant Jew, I was never able to drink this traditional delicacy, but as the memories of bygone days flood back each year, I've discovered that it's really very simple to make at home and share with the family on these cold winter nights.

In England, claret (Bordeaux wine) was traditionally used, but the kosher variety closest in taste is the Yarden Mount Hermon Red, which is readily available from kosher wine suppliers in North America.

MULLED WINE

2 bottles of Yarden Mount Hermon Red wine
 ¾ cup of white sugar
 1 orange peel of 1 lemon
 5 whole cloves
 1 stick of cinnamon
 4 cardamom pods
 1 large pinch of freshly grated nutmeg
 1 little piece of peeled fresh ginger can be added to the pan if desired

Place the sugar in a saucepan and heat on very low heat. Peel the orange and lemon and add to the pan. Juice the orange and, together with the nutmeg, cloves, cinnamon, cardamom and ginger (if using), add to the pan. Stir in enough of the wine to cover the sugar and then bring to the boil. Boil for a couple of minutes until you have syrup and then turn down the heat before adding the rest of the wine. Gently heat for around 5 minutes, and when the wine is warm and a delicious aroma fills the kitchen, strain, ladle into glasses and serve.

Hamas leader urges Israel's destruction

Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Hamas leader Khaled Meshal praised his group's attacks on Tel Aviv last month and said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's home would be destroyed the next time hostilities between Israel and Hamas flared up.

Meshal, on a visit to the Gaza Strip for the first time, was speaking to students at the Islamic University of Gaza on Sunday.

Meshal said Gazan fighters had destroyed Defence Minister Ehud Barak's home, an apparent reference to a number of rockets that were fired at Tel Aviv, where Barak lives, during Israel's eight-day war with Gaza last month. No rockets hit the city. They either fell harmlessly or were intercepted by the Iron Dome anti-missile defence system.

"You destroyed Barak's home," Meshal said.

"May you destroy Netanyahu's home, too."

During the operation, Hamas propaganda disseminated a number of false reports exaggerating its military prowess, including claims it hit areas north of Tel Aviv and downed Israeli planes.

Netanyahu criticizes
Abbas for failing to denounce
Meshal's call to jihad

On Saturday, Meshal celebrated Hamas' 25th anniversary by popping out of a model of an M75 rocket, the longest-range missile in Hamas's arsenal, before giving a speech to an adoring Gazan crowd.

On Saturday, Meshal gave a vitriolic public speech in which he promised to continue fighting until all of Palestine is liberated.

Meanwhile, Netanyahu denounced Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas on Sunday for his participation in an ongoing reconciliation effort with Hamas, saying that Hamas has "no intention of compromising with us. They want to destroy the state."

"Yesterday [Saturday] we were re-exposed to our enemies' true face," Netanyahu said at the opening of his weekly cabinet meeting, referring to the widely publicized calls for the destruction of Israel by Meshal at the Saturday rally in Gaza.

"It's interesting that Abbas has issued no condemnation of the remarks about the destruction of Israel, just as previously he did not condemn the missiles that were fired at Israel [before and during Operation Pillar of Defence]. To my regret, he strives for unity with the same Hamas that is supported by Iran."

CANADA

Cdn.-Wed Gays Split

TEL AVIV — A gay Israeli couple has been granted a divorce by an Israeli family court for the first time. The divorce of Tel Aviv University professor Avi Even, the first openly gay Knesset member, and Dr. Amit Kama was granted Dec. 2 by the Ramat Gan Family Court, which ordered the Interior Minister to register their status as divorced.

Ha'aretz reported. They were married in Canada in 2004, but only Canadian citizens can be divorced in Canada. They also were the first same-sex male couple in Israel to have their legal right of adoption recognized. Even and Kama filed a lawsuit with Israel's Supreme Court that forced the Interior Ministry to register their marriage in 2006 recognizing the marriage abroad, bypassing the Chief Rabbinate. They bypassed the rabbinate again with the divorce ruling. The couple split three years ago, and Even now wants to marry another man abroad.

WORLD

End Tax Cuts: Rabbis

WASHINGTON — More than 275 U.S. rabbis signed a letter to Congress urging lawmakers to end tax cuts for people earning more than $250,000 a year. As part of the ongoing campaign by Bend the Arc: A Jewish Partnership for Justice, community advocacy events will be held in homes and community centres throughout the United States. Prominent rabbis from all the Jewish movements signed the letter, including Irving (Yitz) Greenberg, David Saperstein, Ellen Weinberg Dreyfus and Sydney Mintz.

Art Causes Outrage

STOCKHOLM — A Swedish art gallery owner defended his gallery's decision to show a painting made of Holocaust victims' ashes as "having no moral flaws." Martin Bryder, who owns a gallery in Lund, told Sverige Radio that he "sees no moral problem or flaw with exhibiting" the painting created by artist Carl Michael von Reform Mvmt. Raps Israel On Settlements

TAMPA, Fla. — The Union for Reform Judaism criticized Israel for its decision to build new settlement housing and the Palestinians for unilaterally seeking upgraded status at the United Nations.

The new policy was adopted overwhelmingly Dec. 2 after a debate at the group's board of trustees meeting in St. Petersburg, Fla. More than 200 board members of URJ's Central Conference of American Rabbis and its Zionist wing ARZA attended.

The resolution condemned the Palestinians "for the unilateral decision to seek upgraded status at the United Nations as counterproductive to the cause of peace" and expressed "deep concern" to countries that supported them or abstained.

The UN General Assembly voted this month to give the Palestinians non-member state observer status.

On Israel's plan to build in the E1 corridor between Jerusalem and the Jewish settlement of Ma'aleh Adumim, the resolution said it "would split the Ramallah region off from Bethlehem, effectively cutting the West Bank in two and making a contiguous Palestinian state virtually impossible... Building there makes progress toward peace far more challenging, and is difficult to reconcile with the government of Israel's stated commitment to a two-state solution."

The resolution also urges the Palestinians "to return to the negotiating table immediately without preconditions, as Israel has committed to doing."

Hausswloff using the ashes of victims from the Majdanek extermination camp. The exhibit is slated to open at the Martin Bryder Gallery on Dec. 15. Von Hausswloff reportedly collected the ashes more than 20 years ago. Salomon Schulman, a teacher of Yiddish in Lund said he found the display "disgusting" and called it "a desecration of Jewish bodies." The directorate of the museum at Majdanek said it's "deeply shocked and outraged" by the art. "This action is an artistic provocation deserving only to be condemned. In addition, it is certain that the Swedish painter did not enter into possession of the ashes legally," it said.

Circle of Care delivers 'emergency' meals

Agency helps survivors get through winter

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Circle of Care volunteers and staff recently delivered thousands of "emergency" meals to 381 Holocaust survivors.

The recipients are clients who receive services through a Claims Conference grant that funds organizations providing essential services around the world for Jewish victims of Nazi persecution.

The Claims Conference works closely with these agencies to develop strategies to keep Holocaust victims healthy and fed, to deliver care in their homes, to bring them socialization opportunities, and to obtain government benefits they may be entitled to.

Circle of Care, on behalf of the Claims Conference, provides homemaking and personal care. Kosher Meals on Wheels and transportation to eligible survivors, as well as emergency assistance to Hungarian survivors.

Arnold Foss, Circle of Care's director of communications, said the 2,286 meals – each recipient received six meals intended for either lunch or dinner – came frozen and are meant to be kept in the freezer for emergencies.

"In the event of bad weather, there will always be food in the house," he said.

The recipients also received a small Chanukah bag funded by United Way, which included Chanukah gelt and a clementine orange, "as an added little treat. Small things make a big difference. The meals were definitely well received," he said.

The volunteers and staff took their children with on deliveries, Foss said, so it was a good opportunity for the seniors to enjoy the youngsters. "It was also a learning experience for the kids. It was a good family experience."

He said that the agency plans on making this an annual event, "as long as we have funding."

Seeking a respite for the soul, some silence from the noise of the constant lies uttered against Israel, a restorative balm for emotions still roiling from the IDF's fighting with Hamas and Mahmoud Abbas' successful gambit at the United Nations. I turned last week to music.

I am sure many people, seeking the same result, did so too.

The late renowned French actor and mime, Marcel Marceau, wrote a great deal about music and silence. Because of his life's work, he understood how profoundly they combine. "Music is done with silence; silence is full of music," he wrote.

But not as many people had the good fortune to find that restorative space of music-filled silence the way I did last week: from three special performers.

Leonard Cohen. Books and biographies have been written about the hoary-headed master poet, author and songwriter. He is an international star whose poetry and music resonate across generations. (Please see the review of the Toronto concert on page 31.)

His voice is a replication of his face, craggy and deeply etched. Starting from his comfortable and comforting talking voice, it reaches to a very low base, essentially scraping the floor. But it was not his voice that held the audience in thrall at the Air Canada Centre last week.

It was the sublime combination of the provocative prose poems, the sophisticated musical arrangements, his obviously affectionate and respectful relationship with the nine musicians and singers at his side on the stage and his commitment to fully entertaining the many thousands who came to hear and see him.

Cohen held nothing back.

And in showing our heartfelt appreciation, neither did his audience.

Alon Goldstein. Fully 36 years younger than Leonard Cohen, Alon play. The score demands technical dexterity, finely honed anticipation and of course, enormous self-confidence to "attack" Tchaikovsky's highly complicated musical statements and soaring flourishes.

The composer's instructions attached to the concerto's three movements are like a road map for the upcoming musical journey: The allegro brillante e molto vivace suggests a sparkling and lively first movement played with a great deal of zest; the andante non troppo means a moderate, walking pace, but not too moderate! And finally, the allegro con fuoco means not only more quickly than the andante but "with fire".

The Russian composer intended for the piece to musically climb and fall, to move swiftly and cautiously; to stir and to calm. Under Rubikis' controlled direction and Goldstein's brilliant playing, they surely faithfully fulfilled Tchaikovsky's intention.

Myrna Rabinowitz. Between Cohen and Goldstein in years, is angel-voiced Myrna Rabinowitz. A child of survivors, Rabinowitz grew up in a Yiddish-speaking home in Montreal. Yiddish was the rich and emotionally yielding

The balm of music

Goldstein is one of the most exciting young pianists in the international music world. He plays with flair and flamboyance, emotionally, with great poise and superior technical grace.

Goldstein's considerable skills were on display at the Roy Thomson Hall. He was the piano solo with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra under the guest conductorship of Ainars Rubikis for the performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 2.

The program notes euphemistically describe the concerto as "mighty". In this case "mighty" refers to tempestuous, ardent and impassioned language through which she formed her very first understandings of our world and dreamed her first dreams.

Rabinowitz gently conveys that cultural richness and deeply-welled emotion in her CD recording Lullabies and Longing.

Based today in Vancouver, Rabinowitz is a singer/songwriter of Jewish music, the female vocalist for the Jewish World Band Tzimmers of Vancouver. Five of the 10 songs on Lullabies and Longings are original pieces that Rabinowitz wrote "in loving memory" of her parents and for her grandchildren.

Rabinowitz poignantly and at times even achingly, as in her rendition of Moyshel Mayn Fraynd (Moshel my friend) captures the innumerable ways in which Yiddish conveys kindness, vulnerability and surpassing warmth.

Myrna Rabinowitz

The CD cover for Lullabies and Longings

As befitting the types of songs on the CD, Rabinowitz sings tenderly and sometimes tremblingly, seared affection embracing the plain meaning of the words and a patently shining love summoning forth the shuddering memories that her songs evoke.

Lullabies and Longings is available for purchase at the singer's website, www.myrnarabinowitz.com and in Toronto at Israel's, and at the Baycrest and Mount Sinai gift shops.

United Church not against Israel, says official

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rev. Bruce Gregersen, program officer of the General Council of the United Church, believes there has been much misunderstanding of the United Church of Canada's "Report of the Working Group on Israel/Palestine Policy," released earlier this year.

Rev. Gregersen spoke Dec. 3 at Holy Blossom Temple as part of the synagogue's Schwartz/Reisman Israel series. Rabbi Dow Marmur, the congregation's rabbi emeritus, interviewed him after his presentation.

Rev. Bruce Gregersen, left, and Rabbi Dow Marmur [Frances Kraft photo]

The United Church is the only mainstream church that has affirmed Israel as a Jewish state, Rev. Gregersen said.

"We've encouraged the purchase of Israeli goods. The only thing we've moved forward on is settlement products. We did not want to confuse it with the boycott, divestment and sanctions issue [regarding all of Israel]... All these [things] cause me to wonder, what do we have to do to make it clear that we support the existence, safety and thriving of Israel?" he asked.

To provide context, Rev. Gregersen noted that the United Church is among "other mainline churches around the world" that "have decided to initiate economic action" against goods produced in the settlements, he said.

He added that 22 organizations – mostly church-based – produced a report last month recommending to the European Union consumer labelling of products from the settlements.

Such labelling is required in the United Kingdom, Denmark and South Africa, he added.

As well, "a more comprehensive option of banning settlement products is already proposed by Ireland."

Rev. Gregersen suggested three reasons why "these kinds of actions [have become] so prevalent."

He believes that, because of Israel's expansion of settlements, "the window is closing" on the possibility of a two-state solution that would result in "a secure and safe Israel side by side with a secure Palestinian state."

As well, he cited an increase in "specific and focused travel from Christian communities to come and see for themselves what is happening in the occupied territories," and "the call of Palestinian Christians themselves." He cited "unjust and harsh treatment of Palestinians" including home demolitions, uprooting of olive groves and restrictions to water access.

This summer's document affirmed "continued support for a two-state solution" as well as for "Israel as a Jewish state... a homeland for the Jewish People and a democratic state," he said.

The report also said that "the language of apartheid is not helpful and should not be used." As well, it recognized the Palestinian right of return, which it said "has to be negotiated in a way that doesn't undermine the demographic integrity of Israel."

The church "does not support the formal divestment, boycott and sanctions movement... but don't confuse Israel with the settlements," Rev. Gregersen said.

A member of the synagogue noted from the audience that the document's recommendations could damage Israel's economy "in ways you have said you do not want to do," because of the difficulty identifying which Israeli products are made in the settlements.

Rabbi Marmur, making a distinction between pro-Arab and anti-Jewish sentiment, commented that the United Church "doesn't seem to show concern for the many Arabs and Palestinians in other Arab countries who are treated less than graciously" – only for those in Israel.

Rev. Gregersen acknowledged the seriousness of the rabbi's comment, but said he wasn't sure he could answer in a way that would satisfy the rabbi. He said that the United Church is a small church without resources and has been involved in this issue for decades, and is relying on reports from Christians in the region.

"I hope you'll forgive us Jews if we think you've moved backward," Rabbi Marmur said. "There seems to be something in the United Church that has it in for us Jews in the guise of being anti-Israel or critical of Israel."

In the question period, Rev. Gregersen said that a weakness of the report was that it "did not adequately speak about the threats to Israel and teaching of hatred against Israel."

Joan Garson, president of Arzeno, the International Federation of Reform and Progressive Religious Zionists, thanked the speakers, acknowledging their "civility, good humour and straightforwardness."

Pro-Palestinian Jewish group linked to church

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

An interview on the rabble.ca website has raised the questions of just how Jewish Independent Jewish Voices (IJV) is, and what role, if any, did the United Church of Canada (UCC) play in the creation of the organization?

In a recent podcast on the rabble.ca website, a member of IJV's national steering committee traces its origins to "some members of the United Church who happened to be Jews."

Robert Allison, an IJV member from Hamilton, said in 2006, United Church members were "alarmed" that the church was being accused of antisemitism as it considered a resolution calling for the divestment from "companies contributing to the Israeli occupation."

"They along with other people started to work with members of the United Church to show there was an alternative Jewish voice, namely that not all Jews supported the actions of the State of Israel, and there were some progressive voices."

In 2008, the United Church provided IJV with a $900 grant to offset travel expenses for a conference where the group was founded. A year later, relations between the Church and Canadian Jewish Congress reached a low point when Congress complained that the Church was consulting with the group, which advocated an anti-Israel boycott.

The rabble.ca interview was seized upon by blogger Richard Klagsbrun, writing in the Eye on a Crazy Planet blog site.

Klagsbrun, a writer and filmmaker, pointed out being Jewish and a member of the United Church were mutually exclusive and "by their professed beliefs and actions, it seems clear that IJV is made up of Christians masquerading as Jews for the sole purpose of attempting to lend a sick pseudo-legitimacy to their demonization of the Jewish state."

Klagsbrun said IJV members have explicitly stated they play a special role in the pro-Palestinian movement. "They are only Jews for the purpose of demonizing Israel," he said. "They're alibi Jews. They provide cover for charges of antisemitism. They are Jews for no other purpose of providing cover."

Sid Shniad, a member of IJV's national steering committee, distanced the organization from Allison's comments.

"He wasn't a member of the IJV when it was started," he told The CJN.

Asked why Allison described the origins of IJV as he did, Shniad said, "I don't know. It was completely erroneous."

He said IJV's membership of several hundred people is Jewish, though he acknowledged "there is a member who is Jewish who is also a member of the United Church."

"There are Jewish Quakers, Jewish members of the Unitarian Church. I assume it's similar," he said.

In its early days, IJV supporters appealed to a number of organizations "to help get it started," Shniad said. Among the groups that came through was the United Church, with $900. The grant became "highly contentious," he acknowledged.

Bruce Gregersen, the United Church's chief program officer, said "the grant was a small grant to assist in bringing speakers, specifically Muslim speakers, to the IJV conference."

The grant did create controversy within the Church, Gregersen said, but "it would be inaccurate to say UCC was involved in forming IJV, apart from saying some members would support it."

"We relate to the many voices within the Jewish community," and IJV is one of those voices, he added.

IJV shares the United Church's boycott campaign and co-operates with the Church through an organization called United Network for a Just Peace in Palestine and Israel, Shniad said.

"There was an attempt by IJV to join Canadian Jewish Congress" when that organization operated several years ago. "The application for membership was refused," Shniad said.

Congress was later incorporated in the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel said "I won't apologize for the absence of a seat at the Jewish table for IJV."

"Within the mainstream Jewish community you'll not find a legitimate place for a voice that objects to the very idea of a Jewish state," he said.

Fogel called IJV "the secular equivalent of Neturei Karta (an Orthodox sect that believes only God can create a State of Israel). Their view is antithetical to the reality of a Jewish state in the ancient homeland of the Jewish people."

Fogel pointed to the views of one of IJV's founders, Diana Ralph, who believes the 9/11 attacks were a U.S. government conspiracy.

"What does that tell you about the nature of the organization?" he asked.

Shniad, a retired union staffer from Vancouver, said "we have a range of positions in IJV, from strong Zionists to strong anti-Zionists....We don't have positions on one-state or two-states, pro-Zionist or anti-Zionist."

"We're concerned about the application of international law and the refusal to recognize the human rights of everyone."

Human rights reminder

Sixty-four years ago, on Dec. 10, the United Nations promulgated and its members adopted the International Declaration of Human Rights. Ever since, International Human Rights Day has been "celebrated" on the same date.

Written after World War II as the sun had just begun to rise over the darkened, brutalized terrain of so much of the world, the document enshrines the highest values and aspirations of civilized men and women. The document hoped to open a door onto a new world.

It begins: "Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world..."

"Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind..."

"Whereas it is essential to promote the development of friendly relations between nations..."

How should we respond, therefore, when not one leader of the Arab world, let alone the purportedly moderate Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, condemned the call to genocide last weekend by Hamas chief Khaled Meshal?

Meshal fulminated against Israel. "We are not giving up any inch of Palestine. It will remain Islamic and Arab for us and nobody else. Jihad and armed resistance is the only way. We cannot recognize Israel's legitimacy. From the sea to the river, from north to south, we will not give up any part of Palestine — it is our country, our right and our homeland."

Was it only a fool's grasp at a straw to hope that Abbas, the anointed of the western world, would have publicly protested: "No! That is no longer the way. We wish to live alongside, not instead of, Israel."

But it would appear that despite the new UN state status conferred upon Abbas' PLO, the Palestinian leader believes the provisions of the declaration do not apply to him. Of course, in this belief, he is at one with all the members of Arab League who applauded Meshal and the various other political leaders who regard the declaration as merely a decorative plaque to hang on a wall hiding a crack in the plaster rather than as an earnest, meaningful expression of human values.

But the protection of human rights must not only concern us when it is beyond our borders. CJN reporter Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf reminds us in a compelling, two-part series about the predicament of the European Roma that we must ensure our own laws — here in Canada — conform to both the spirit and the letter of the International Declaration of Human Rights.

We firmly believe that the recognition of the inherent dignity and equal rights of all members of the human family is indeed the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world. We must therefore practise what we believe if we are to point out the disgusting and cynical hypocrisy of men like Mahmoud Abbas.

UN vote on Palestinian status (1)

The UN General Assembly has voted 138 votes to nine in favour of granting Palestine non-member observer status ("Canada votes against PA statehood bid," Dec. 6). Part of Palestine is Gaza, which is controlled by the recognized terrorist group, Hamas. How many of the 138 nations would have voted in favour of Palestine had they been subjected to thousands of rockets being aimed at a portion of their civilian population on a daily basis for months and months leading up to the vote? I would have thought that such belligerence would be a bar to any type of UN membership rather than a ticket for admission. Now Palestine can be admitted as a member of the UN Human Rights Council, that bastion of human rights, with such members as Syria, Libya, China and Cuba.

The Palestinian Authority has been steadfast in its refusal to meet with Israel to pursue peace, notwithstanding Israel's position that it will do so anytime anywhere without preconditions. Perhaps, now that it is a member, the United Nations can assert its authority and push the Palestinians to meet and pursue negotiations, which hopefully will lead to a two-state solution.

UN vote on Palestinian status (2)

I just printed a list of countries that voted no, abstained and voted yes to a Palestinian bid for non-member UN status ("Why they stood with Israel," Dec. 6). Sadly, more countries didn't have the guts to say no, but at least 41 had the guts to abstain. In this day and age, when everyone is afraid of Muslim retaliation, they were brave. All I have to say is when Jews are planning vacations, charity donations, or feel they want to help the underprivileged, they should check this list before they decide where they want to spend their dollars.

I'm not surprised by the 138 countries that voted yes. Most of them were Arab countries and many were African. Ireland and South Africa don't surprise me, either, because they are pro-Palestinian. But I was surprised that Austria, Denmark, Japan, Italy, bankrupt Greece and Switzerland voted yes.

As I write this, Ireland is planning, as I am sure other countries are, too, a boycott of Israel, so I say Boycott, Boycott, Boycott. They are doing it to us, so we can do

UN vote on Palestinian status (3)

As an Israeli-Canadian who loves Israel, I am heartened that the UN General Assembly has chosen the path of peace and recognized Palestine as a non-member observer state ("Canada votes against PA statehood bid," Dec. 6). This move brings us closer to the goal of the two-state solution, as the state of Palestine is legitimized by the global community. Sadly, Canada has chosen the path of ignorance in this debate and allied itself with the reactionary hawkishness of the Netanyahu government. Canada has lost its credibility as an honest broker for peace, and more so, as a nation committed to pursuing global justice.

West Bank construction

Israel's plans to construct 3,000 more homes in the West Bank is not in Israel's own long-term best interests. This construction activity will block east Jerusalem from the rest of the West Bank, making it less economically viable. This announcement has put Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas into an impossible situation, in which he will be unable to negotiate with Israel on a possible peace agreement. It will embolden militant Palestinians to give up talking to Israel and to resort to violence or to appealing to the UN for recognition. Canada's Foreign Minister John Baird said, in the context of the recent Palestinian UN motion, "This [construction] will not advance the cause of peace or spur a return to negotiations."

The Palestinian UN upgrade: setting things straight

Alan Baker

Now that the dust has settled on the Palestinian UN upgrade bid and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has received his applause and cudos from the UN Plenary, from the Europeans and from many Israelis as the hero and saviour of the Palestinian people, it is time to place things in their correct proportion and to face the legal and political truths of the situation.

The UN upgrade resolution has neither created a Palestinian state, nor did it grant any kind of statehood to the Palestinians. The UN does not have the legal and political power to establish states. It merely upgraded the observer status of the PLO's UN representation to that of a non-member-state observer for internal purposes within the United Nations and its constituent organs and agencies.

General Assembly resolutions, including the Palestinian upgrade resolution, can neither determine nor dictate international law or practice. They cannot obligate any state or organization to act or to accept what they recommend. They are nothing more than non-obligatory recommendations expressing the political view of the states that voted for them. Thus, this resolution constitutes one more General Assembly recommendatory resolution on Middle East issues, added to the hundreds of such resolutions that have already been adopted by the General Assembly and that abound in the annals of the UN.

In the same way that previous politically motivated and one-sided resolutions on the Middle East generally, or regarding Jerusalem, settlements, borders or refugees in particular, have neither practically affected nor influenced the actual situation on the ground and have not affected in one iota the actual negotiating process, so the present resolution, referring to the General Assembly's vision of a Palestinian state within "the pre-1967 borders," will have absolutely no affect or influence on the situation on the ground between Israel and the Palestinians, which can only be influenced as a result of direct negotiations and agreement between them.

The internationally accepted requirements for statehood include, among other things, a unified territorial unit, responsible governance of its people and capability of fulfilling international commitments and responsibilities. Furthermore, the UN Charter requires that a state seeking membership in the UN be "a peace-loving state" that accepts and is willing and capable of carrying out the obligations of the UN Charter.

Clearly, the Palestinians have far to go until they can honestly admit to realizing these very basic qualities and requirements for statehood. With Hamas/Iran-ruled Gaza and the Fatah-ruled West Bank still at ideological and military loggerheads with each other, while thousands of rockets are periodically, intentionally and indiscriminately fired from Gaza into Israel's towns and villages in stark and wilful violation of the norms of international humanitarian law, and thousands more are still stockpiled for future use by the terror organizations openly and proudly operating in Gaza, no logical observer could reasonably endorse Palestinian readiness for statehood, let alone UN membership.

The areas of Gaza and the West Bank (Judea and Samaria) have never been determined in any legal document or agreement to be sovereign Palestinian areas. UN Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) called for a negotiated settlement of the conflict between the states concerned, and pursuant to that, Israel and the PLO agreed to settle all the relevant issues regarding the fate of the areas in question by negotiation between them.

Both Israel and the Palestinians entertain claims over the areas in dispute, the Palestinians basing their claims on long-time residence and the right to self-determination, and Israel basing itself on longstanding historic and indigenous claims, including the chain of documents originating the sovereignty of the areas in question or the state or authority to which such areas belong.

Thus, the legal status of the territories that has prevailed up to now, as agreed upon between Israel and the PLO in the Oslo accords, continues to prevail after the Palestinian upgrade resolution. Neither the status of Israel in the territories, nor that of the Palestinians, has therefore changed in any way. The new claim voiced by the Palestinian leadership that Israel became, overnight, an occupant of Palestinian sovereign territory, is without any basis.

From the start of the peace-process negotiations, it was agreed between the parties, and accepted by the international community in witnessing and endorsing the Oslo accords, that the issue of settlements would be one of several issues to be negotiated in the permanent status negotiations. None of the agreements signed between the parties contain any limitation on building by the parties in the areas under their respective jurisdiction.

The attempt by the Palestinian leadership to isolate the settlements issue and to turn it into a precondition for further negotiation, as well as threats to initiate action regarding settlements in the International Criminal Court, undermine and prejudice any chance of a return to viable negotiations.

The sooner the Palestinians demonstrate a capability and willingness to return to the negotiating table, the sooner the issue of settlements will be amicably solved and removed from the bilateral and international agenda.

A central aspect of the Palestinian's UN campaign has been the premise that UN recognition would enable them to initiate charges against Israeli leaders, officers and officials in the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague.

Despite the prominence given this premise, it is highly questionable.

The ICC is neither a UN organ nor a specialized agency of the UN and is thus not obliged to follow the recommendations of the UN General Assembly. It is an "independent, permanent judicial institution" as determined in its relationship agreement with the UN.

The 1998 ICC Statute provides that the court's jurisdiction may be activated only by states. In January 2009, the Palestinian Authority turned to the ICC in a formal letter declaring its readiness to accept the ICC's jurisdiction on the "territory of Palestine." However, the ICC Prosecutor announced that his office did not have the competence to determine whether the term "state" could be applied to the Palestinian Authority. He added that "competence for determining the term 'state' within the meaning of Article 12 [of the ICC Statute] rests, in the first instance, with the UN secretary general who, in case of doubt, will defer to the guidance of the General Assembly. The Assembly of States Parties of the Rome Statute could also in due course decide to address the matter in accordance with article 112(2)(g) of the statute."

It is questionable if the secretary general will take up this "hot potato." He is not obligated to do so.

In considering the issue of whether the Palestinians could be considered a state for the purposes of approaching the ICC, the fact remains that even after the General Assembly's latest resolution, the Palestinians are no more a state today than they were before. Thus, it remains highly unlikely that the court, the Assembly of States Parties or the UN secretary general, if functioning properly and legally and without political manipulation, would be able to accept Palestinian complaints against Israeli officials.

The ICC has attempted to avoid having its independent juridical character politicized or otherwise compromised. The attempts by the Palestinians to politicize the ICC and turn it into a whipping-body against Israel and its leadership would doubtless cause considerable damage to the court and its viability.

A solution to the Middle East issues cannot be imposed by UN General Assembly resolutions, whatever majority they may command and however many times they may be repeated.

As has been universally acknowledged by the Security Council and by the parties themselves in the various peace treaties and other agreements signed between them, only genuine and bona fide negotiations will produce the sought-after solution and permanent settlement, including opening the route to Palestinian statehood.

Creating false hopes among the Palestinian population will only result in frustration and disappointment, once it becomes evident to all that nothing has changed, or is likely to change, until the Palestinian leadership is capable of representing all Palestinians in negotiation with Israel. Similarly, futile attempts to initiate criminal charges against Israel and its leaders do not portend any willingness on the Palestinians' part to create the ambience of mutual trust and confidence necessary for a resumption of sincere and genuine negotiations.

Alan Baker is the former legal adviser to Israel's Foreign Ministry and the former Israel ambassador to Canada. He is the director of the Institute for Contemporary Affairs at the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met in Washington in 2010, the last time the two leaders spoke face to face. (IGPO photo) nating in the 1917 Balfour Declaration, through the League of Nations British Mandate, and the UN Charter. However, notwithstanding these claims, both sides have committed themselves in the 1993-95 Oslo accords to negotiate between them the permanent status of the areas.

Thus, any references in all of the many UN resolutions to "occupied Palestinian territories" are nothing more than an irresponsible prejudgment of an issue that has been agreed between the Palestinians and Israel to be settled in negotiations between them. It is indicative of nothing more than wishful thinking on the part of those states voting in favour of it. Such resolutions have not and cannot determine

Keep the cause, junk the junk

Don't try to sell me Christmas cards. I'm all stocked up. Not only on holiday greeting cards, but return address labels, gift tags and other paraphernalia festooned with "seasonal" graphics: evergreen boughs, doves, red and white caps, chubby men with white beards, diminutive men with pointy ears, snowflakes, cross-shaped stars, reindeer, and so forth. Nothing overtly religious, like a crèche or nativity scene – just, well, seasonal.

It's not an identity crisis. I didn't buy any of this stuff. The items simply appear, unrequested, in my mailbox, beginning early November and continuing for about two months. The return addresses vary, but, so far as I can tell, none of this holiday cache comes from religious institutions clamouring for my conversion.

Like most folks these days, I rarely get mail any more. People who write me personal letters use email. Perhaps I receive the occasional birthday or anniversary card, but even these, increasingly, reach me via the Internet. Some bills show up, but these, too, mostly arrive electronically. This time of year, however, my postal box is often filled to overflowing.

That's because most often, what comes to my physical mailbox are solicitations from charitable organizations. Most of them are worthy, and they need funding to further such important things as medical research, education, peace, and tolerance, and to fight such things as poverty, hunger, inequality and homelessness. And since the "holiday season" coincides with the fiscal year end, it's clearly a propitious time to ask high and low rollers to open up their hearts and purses.

There is an art and a tradition that shapes mass-mailing solicitation, and it's rare this time of year to receive a request accompanied only by a description of the cause. Instead, bulging envelopes outstrip the holding capacity of our postal box – envelopes containing unasked for "holiday gifts." The sender (or their marketing advisers) clearly hope that, reminded of the "holiday spirit," I will be overcome by the imperative of "goodwill toward men" and other "seasonal" slogans and that I will feel obligated to "pay" the sender for these gifts with a contribution to the cause.

I've put words such as "holiday" and "season" in quotation marks, because, although that's the generic language used in these campaigns, the pitch is centred on Christmas and the rituals associated with it. In our household, this kind of stuff goes straight to the recycling bin. Then we evaluate the appended solicitations based on merit.

But this year, I decided to do something different. I tossed the whole packet, contribution card and all. I'm not wiping these causes off my list permanently, but I don't want to add to the statistics of positive responses to this particular way of soliciting.

Sara R. Horowitz
in Toronto

Canada is a diverse country. So many people who support cancer or diabetes research or homeless shelters or children in need don't celebrate Christmas. It seems to me that the varied traditions of the givers deserves if not respect, then at least acknowledgment. Calling it a "holiday season" doesn't quite suffice.

Canada is also a country that values the environment, and there is no need to feed an already glutted recycling bin. Even my Christian friends toss most of the "holiday" stuff that arrives in their mailboxes. Most people like to choose the cards they send, or they send greetings via the Internet. Many of us print out envelopes via our computers, so we rarely need to affix return address labels. And it would be nice to think that more of the contributed funds go to the cause, rather than to printing out this stuff.

I wonder how much direct-mail marketing is based on outdated research that hasn't yet caught up with the demographics and social media habits of 21st-century Canada. I'm not suggesting printing even more unrequested stuff in an attempt to capture all of the religions and ethnicities of this country. Let the causes speak instead of trying to rope in contributions with cheesy gifts.

So have a festive and illuminated Chanukah, and deploy your Chanukah gelt in ways that would make the Rambam proud!

Healing that goes beyond the cure

When a prominent member of the Jewish community was diagnosed with cancer a few years ago, she learned of the U.S.-based Center for Jewish Healing. She writes in a private letter: "I inquired into the existence of a similar framework in Toronto, but was disappointed to hear that there was no such robust resource."

In fact, the Toronto Jewish Healing Project was established in the mid-1990s by a number of concerned workers in the field. Etta Ginsberg-McEwan, a retired social worker, became its extraordinarily effective volunteer co-ordinator. Rabbis and lay people from across the spectrum of the community joined the committee. Others provided modest funds that enabled us to run groups, conferences for professionals and healing services.

After some years, it became clear that the program needed a stronger framework. Following the lead of large Jewish communities elsewhere, we handed over the reins to a local Jewish agency in the hope that it would expand the activities. It didn't happen. As a result, some of the original initiators and other volunteers have now taken back the program in an effort to revive it.

The need for it has been articulated in the same letter: "I believe that for people going through personal difficulty and pain through serious illness and loss, the value of a resource for material, prayers and general guidance that draws on generations of Jewish wisdom and insight cannot be overstated." This reflects a widely held view.

The letter also articulates the reason:

"As soon as one's present-day pain is seen in the context of the continuity of our lives and

Rabbi Dow Marmur
in Toronto

heritage, it becomes easier to develop the inner, spiritual resources necessary to go on living."

Hence the sense of loss: "Personally, I have found the absence of such a program a void in the community and wish it did exist. It certainly could have been a great source of comfort to me. As in so many other areas, resources are limited, but this need not be a high-cost service."

Indeed it wasn't. Most of the modest funds were spent on telephone, stationery and paid announcements. Those who are now restarting the program are looking for volunteers and, yes, money to cover basic expenses. Jack Kugelmass, a social worker and therapist, has agreed to co-ordinate the work for the time being.

He'll be pleased to hear from potential co-workers and users, and individuals and institutions prepared to provide seed money. He can be reached at 647-873-4804 and at torontojewishhealing@gmail.com. More information can be found at www.torontojewishhealing.com.

Physical pain management and, hopefully, cure is the task of the medical profession. Judaism has always held doctors in high esteem. But there's more to healing than cure. We all know people who've been cured but not healed and those who are healing without being cured.

Healing isn't an alternative to medicine. It isn't a form of psychotherapy or "the laying of hands." Healing seeks to help people reach out to God. In the words of our liturgy: "Heal us, O Eternal, and we will be healed." The same prayer praises God for granting us "complete healing for all our afflictions."

God doesn't cure. Doctors might. But God helps us to carry the burden of illness. Jewish sacred texts provide the context. Many who've come together to study in the hallowed way of Jewish learning testify that that they've been strengthened both by sharing their pain with others and learning from what tradition teaches. The pain hasn't disappeared, but the experience of sharing and learning made it more bearable.

Heeding Holy Writ brings students in touch with the teachers of long ago. The ancients carried similar burdens as we do and asked similar questions. Asking the questions can be no less helpful than finding the answers.

One of the important insights of this kind of study is the discovery that our forebears never lost hope and never gave up on God. They suffered no less than we do, but they sought to transcend the pain, at times even discern a purpose in it. And if they could find hope and faith, so can we. That's the testimony of many who in the past have availed themselves of the Jewish healing program.

Its anticipated return to the Jewish community in Toronto – and hopefully, in time, to other places – will provide a new resource for Jews in need. It won't remove problems, but it may make them smaller, and thus more bearable.

UN resolution passes, but status quo remains

On Nov. 29, the 65th anniversary of the United Nations' unfulfilled Palestine partition plan, the Palestinians took a symbolic but significant leap forward toward statehood when the UN upgraded their status to non-member observer state and reaffirmed their right to self-determination on the basis of the pre-1967 lines. The UN's General Assembly passed this historic resolution by a lopsided margin of 138 to 9, with 41 abstentions.

The motion, though non-binding, was an embarrassing setback to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government, underscoring the strong international consensus that has coalesced around the concept of Palestinian independence and laying bare Israel's virtual isolation on this combustible issue.

Israel's vehement rejection of the resolution was supported by only a short list of nations: the United States, Canada, the Czech Republic, Panama and a handful of remote South Pacific islands. Countries normally friendly to Israel, such as France, Italy and Costa Rica, backed it, as did powers such as Russia and China and the entire Asian and African bloc. Nations usually close to Israel, ranging from Germany and Poland to Australia and Britain, abstained.

For Israel, this was nothing less than a diplomatic debacle. The Palestinians rejoiced in their victory, concluding they will be able to legally challenge Israel's settlement policies at the International Criminal Court. But in the West Bank — one of the territorial components of Palestinian statehood aside from the Gaza Strip — the status quo prevails.

By virtue of the Oslo accords, which divided the West Bank into Area A, Area B and Area C, Israel remains firmly entrenched in at least two of these places.

In Area C, which accounts for almost two-thirds of the West Bank and contains more than 100 Jewish settlements, Israel retains full civil and military control. Israel, in Area B, shares joint security responsibility with the Palestinian Authority. Only in Area A, where major Palestinian towns are found, is the PA fully in charge of its affairs.

Israel also maintains a tight grip on the West Bank through a system of checkpoints, which regulate the flow of people and trade. Palestinian statehood is thus directly dependent on Israel's goodwill, consent and co-operation.

Before the PA brought its case for statehood to the UN, Israel threatened to rescind economic agreements with the PA and cancel work permits for Palestinian workers employed in Israel. Although Israel did not resort to any of these draconian measures, its response to the resolution was nonetheless punitive.

Israel announced it would withhold $100 million in Palestinian tax revenues. But on a more strategic level, Israel authorized the construction of 3,000 new housing units in eastern Jerusalem and the West Bank and disclosed that preliminary zoning and planning preparations would be undertaken in an empty section of the West Bank known as E-1.

The United States — Israel's chief ally — as well as western European governments condemned the measures as counter-productive, saying they would impair the prospect of enticing the PA back to the negotiating table and achieving a two-state solution. UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon was equally critical, describing Israel's plans as a major blow to the attainment of peace.

To its detractors, the E-1 plan is of particular concern because it would partially cut the West Bank into separate entities and block access to eastern Jerusalem from Ramallah and Bethlehem, thereby rendering a contiguous Palestinian state extremely problematic.

This is an issue that goes to the heart of the matter, especially as far as the Palestinians are concerned. Since 2008, when the last substantive talks took place, the PA has refused to resume negotiations unless Israel stops all construction in the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem and recognizes the pre-1967 lines as the basis for future negotiations.

In his speech to the UN on the eve of the passage of last month's resolution, PA President Mahmoud Abbas expressed a desire to "launch a final serious attempt to achieve peace" based on an Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines and a solution to the Palestinian refugee issue. Last May, in a letter to Abbas, Netanyahu rejected these conditions. Netanyahu has set down his own set of pre-conditions for restarting talks: the PA must recognize Israel as a Jewish state, accept Israeli settlement blocks in the West Bank, acquiesce to an Israeli military presence in the Jordan Valley and end all claims against Israel.

Netanyahu professes to support the notion of a contiguous Palestinian state, having said last April it should not look like "Swiss cheese." But by having doubled the portion of the national budget allocated to settlements in the West Bank, as Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz disclosed recently, Netanyahu's commitment has been called into question.

Three years ago, Israel imposed a 10-month partial settlement freeze in the West Bank, but with the Palestinians demanding a total building moratorium, in line with the Obama administration's policy, negotiations were not resumed. The United States asked Israel to extend the freeze, but Netanyahu declined.

Almost two weeks before the General Assembly upgraded the Palestinians' status at the UN, Abbas laid down two potentially important markers. He said he would be prepared to resume talks with Israel once the national aspirations of the Palestinians were recognized by the UN. And in his clearest definition of what future Israeli borders would be acceptable to the PA, he declared, "I believe that the West Bank and Gaza [are] Palestine, and the other parts [are] Israel."

Commenting on Abbas' statement, Israeli President Shimon Peres described him as "a real partner for peace." Netanyahu, however, dismissed Abbas' formulation, claiming there was "no connection" between his words and deeds.

Mahmoud Abbas addresses the United Nations on Nov. 29.

Cognizant that the peace process is irretrievably bogged down and that Israel's occupation of the West Bank may well erode its character as a democratic Jewish state, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak has suggested that the impasse can be broken with a unilateral Israeli pullout from much of the West Bank, leaving only the settlement blocs in Israel's hands. By all accounts, Netanyahu does not regard Barak's proposal seriously.

Recently, the UN released a report suggesting that a two-state solution is imperilled by three overlapping factors: the current stalemate in negotiations, Israel's continuing presence in the West Bank and the PA's economic woes.

Yaakov Perry, the former director of the Shin Bet internal intelligence agency, has taken note of the paralysis that ails the peace process, having warned that Israel's "sit and do nothing policy" in the West Bank is pushing Israel toward a binational state, which, he asserted, "could spell the destruction of the Zionist vision."

Shaul Mofaz, the leader of Israel's opposition and a former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff, has spoken to this issue, too, having raised the possibility that the threat of a binational state is far greater than the threat posed by a nuclear-armed Iran.

Their warnings may well explain why Ehud Olmert, Israel's former prime minister, went out on a limb and endorsed the PA's bid for non-member state status at the UN. "The Palestinian request," he said, "is congruent with the basic concept of the two-state solution."

Zionism was a response to modernity, prof says

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel offers Jews "a way of Jewish life" that was missing in the Diaspora for 2,000 years, says Hebrew University law professor Ruth Gavison.

Delivering the Pearl and Jack Mandel Lecture in Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto recently, she said that Israeli Jews enjoy the benefit of living in their own land, speaking their own language and no longer being members of a persecuted minority.

Gavison, whose topic was "The State of Israel and Modern Jewish Identity," called the Zionist movement a response to the challenges of modernity.

The enlightenment in western Europe, which resulted in the emancipation of its Jewish citizens, drew a distinction between individual Jews and Judaism and demanded a "privatized" sense of Jewish identity, she observed.

But even as emancipated Jews gave up the public components of their Jewish identity and began regarding Judaism through the prism of culture, they remained strangers in European societies.

Zionism, rebelling against the status quo and rejecting the Diaspora, posited the hypothesis that Jews constitute a people and should rebuild their ancient homeland in Palestine.

Zionism was essentially attractive to Jews who wanted to remain Jewish without practising Judaism, explained Gavison, a sabra.

The message of Zionism, though supported by a minority of Jews, was revolutionary in its implications, she added.

At the end of the day, Zionism enabled Jews to belong to and identify with "a community larger than themselves," noted Gavison, a founding member of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel.

Israel is there for any Jew who desires to live in the Jewish state. "Israel will not close its gate to Jews, or send ships back," she said.

In historical terms, Gavison said, Israel stands as a rebuke to antisemites who murdered Jews during the Holocaust.

"Israel is a good place, a model for public Jewish identity," she added.

Singling out the types of Jews living in Israel, Gavison listed haredim, who prefer isolation to public engagement; national/religious Jews, for whom Israel signifies messianic redemption; traditional Jews, who once formed the core membership of the Zionist movement, and liberal nationalists and liberal cosmopolitans.

The Jewish component of some Israeli Jews is minimal or non-existent, she pointed out. They are more committed to liberal values than to building a Jewish national home in Israel.

Gavison warned that Israel cannot be taken for granted, claiming it may not survive as a distinct Jewish state over the next century.

Israel's Jewish character depends on the size of its Jewish population and the desire of its Jewish citizens to be Jews.

In her view, Israel – an imperfect but impressive nation – was built to maintain Jewish rather than Israeli identity.

Victims of hate reflect on past experiences

Cara Edell

Special to The CJN

Two victims of hate and injustice spoke about their experiences at an event organized by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies at Beth Shalom Synagogue last week.

The Dec. 3 presentation, entitled Confronting the Past and Moving Forward, featured Marina Nemat, a former Iranian political prisoner, and Max Eisen, a Holocaust survivor.

Moderated by National Post comment pages editor Jonathan Kay, the informative discussion gave the speakers a platform to tell their traumatic stories and to explain how they were able to move forward with their lives.

As a young Russian Eastern Orthodox Christian in Iran, Nemat opposed the oppressive policies of the Islamic government. She attended demonstrations and wrote anti-revolutionary articles in a student newspaper. In 1982, at age 16, she was arrested for her views.

Nemat was tortured in the notorious Evin Prison, well known for atrocities against political inmates, and sentenced to death. After two years of incarceration, she was rescued by a prison guard who forced her to marry him.

The guard was later assassinated, and Nemat secretly married her teenage love in a Christian church. The couple escaped to Canada in 1991, where Nemat began writing her memoir.

Eisen, raised in Czechoslovakia, was 15 years old when he was sent to Auschwitz in 1944. He and his family were celebrating the first night of Passover when they were thrown out of their home and eventually deported.

In Auschwitz, Eisen was forced into slave labour. He is the only Holocaust survivor of an extended family of 65 people.

Eisen immigrated to Canada in 1949 and has participated in 10 March of the Living trips to Poland and Israel. Under the auspices of Toronto's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, Max is one of a group of survivors who has dedicated the latter part of his life to educating the next generation.

Like Eisen, Nemat devotes her time to sharing her story "about what it means to be free" with students and in public lectures.

While she recounted the cycle of beatings she endured in Evin Prison and how the guards "tried to destroy [her] soul," Nemat said she managed to "retain [her] humanity" and "have faith in the acts of kindness" she witnessed among her fellow prisoners.

Nemat spent 20 years in silence before being able to talk about the horrors she faced in Iran. "I was in an emotional coma. Survivors need time for the dust to settle."

She said being a witness is "a full-time job," which comes before all other priorities, including family.

Eisen said it took him three years to "become a normal person" after being liberated. "I was scared to leave the camp. I didn't know how the world would greet me."

He said he understands how many Holocaust survivors cannot discuss their pasts, but feels it's his obligation. "It's important to talk about, because people need to know. We're a dying generation. Time is short."

Every day, there are dangers of hate, Eisen said. He remembers visiting Czechoslovakia in 1992 and being called a "kike," an experience that he said proves Canadian Jews must never take freedom for granted.

For Nemat, "forgiveness is a process, not an event." She said she does not wish evil upon those who caused her so much pain, but would rather see "real justice" in her country.

Dangers lurk amid successes for Jews, panel agrees

Ron Csillag
Special The CJN

A panel of three international experts offering a "State of Our People" address last week concluded that while these are anxious, stressful and even dangerous days for Jews worldwide, they also hold unprecedented examples of how far Jews have progressed in just a few decades.

The event, held by Aish Toronto at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, was a benefit for Aish Campus Canada, a university outreach program that supports and trains students across the country to advocate for Israel.

In an informal discussion with moderator Allan Gould, the trio weighed in on several global developments that are fraught with challenges for Jews everywhere.

Bluntly, Elan Carr, an American Middle East terrorism expert and former legal adviser to Israel's justice ministry, predicted that the ceasefire between Hamas and Israel will not hold.

"No, it will not last," said Carr, a former U.S. military officer who served in Iraq. "Look, Israel voluntarily disengaged from Gaza (in 2005) in the hope of peace and what did it get? Israel got 10,000 rockets."

He said he agreed with Israel's decision not to send ground troops into Gaza in the most recent round of fighting.

"You don't risk heavy casualties until you cut off the Hamas' supply routes," which in this case is Iran.

When Iran is defanged, Israel can mount an offensive Panel Members, from left, Allan Gould, Deborah Abisror, Elan Carr and Nathan Diamant, at Aish Toronto's State of Our People event discussing some of the major challenges facing the Jewish people in Europe, the Middle East and North America.

"to destroy Hamas once and for all," he said.

Fellow panellist Nathan Diamant, director of the Institute for Public Affairs of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America (the largest U.S. Orthodox umbrella organization, more popularly known as the Orthodox Union, or OU) agreed the ceasefire will not hold.

Deborah Abisror, executive director of the European Union of Jewish Students, said that "for the first time," European media covering Israel's Operation Pillar of Defence did not portray Palestinians as victims.

"The media are beginning to understand a little that Hamas is the problem for Palestinians, not Israel," said Abisror, whose umbrella organization works to protect some 200,000 Jewish students on 400 campuses from Ireland in the west to Romania in the east.

However, she added that European media are not at the point where they accept Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's recent announcement that Israel has approved the construction of 3,000 new homes for Jews in post-1967 boundaries.

In fact, it's barely worth trying to sway the media in Europe on that issue. "We won't try," Abisror said. "We'll talk about something else."

Carr said Israel's new settlement plan was a direct response to the Palestinian bid to seek upgraded status at the United Nations: "If you're going to engage in unilateral action, we can as well."

Besides, Jewish settlements are not an obstacle to peace, Carr stressed. They weren't in Sinai and Gaza, both of which Israel quit after dismantling settlements.

The Oslo peace agreements do not prevent Israel from building settlements, he went on, but they do prohibit Palestinians from seeking unilateral actions before direct talks with Israel or prior even to recognizing its existence.

"We now have a world so reversed that when the Palestinians violate their agreements and go to the UN for a vote, the world not only does not address them with reprobation, but actually votes in their favour. And when Israel responds by doing something it is permitted to do under prior agreements, the world reacts with hysteria."

To loud applause, Carr said, "Thanks goodness for Prime Minister Stephen Harper."

In the United States, current talks over the so-called fiscal cliff could have negative consequences for Jews, Diamant said. If limits are placed on tax deductions, "it will have dire consequences for Jewish charities."

He said the biggest obstacle facing Jews worldwide is Jewish "illiteracy."

Carr said the chief threat to Jewish survival is "ignorance and apathy." More immediate, however, is the threat of a nuclear Iran.

All the panellists were optimistic about the future. "Optimism is a Jewish religious principle," Carr said. "Even when things look difficult, we are optimistic. Today it's a blessing to be Jewish. We are awash in blessings and affluence."

No one would have predicted even a few decades ago that one day, Chanukah candles would be lit by presidents and prime ministers in the world's capitals, the panel noted.

Max Kalles accepted Aish's Flame of Leadership Award on behalf of 14 recipients, while Laella Saffer accepted the Leading Light Award on behalf of 52 young honorees.

Did Israel's reaction play into Abbas' hands?

Last week's According to Reports looked at Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Nov. 29 UN gambit and Israel's reaction. It ended on a note about the National Post's Jonathan Kay's Nov. 30 rebuke to Israel regarding its settlement policy.

Let us recall: in his UN address Abbas repeatedly referred to Israeli settlements as the roadblock to a two-state solution of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. This not only reinforced the longstanding Palestinian narrative, it also played into the widely held assumption in the West that many of those generally sympathetic to Israel increasingly show signs of sharing.

This column has frequently argued (especially since the collapse of the Annapolis talks in 2008 when Abbas did not reply to Israel's proposal for a viable, contiguous Palestinian state) that the issue of settlements is complicated but resolvable.

The outline of a deal is well-known to both sides: leaving the major settlement blocs around Jerusalem and the Jewish neighbourhoods of eastern Jerusalem in Israel's hands and giving the Palestinians land trades.

The real impediment to a deal lies elsewhere, in the Palestinians' persistent rejection of Jewish claims to Jerusalem and their insistence on the principle of the "right of return" to Israel. In short, the Palestinian rejection of Israel as the Jewish state.

Nonetheless, since settlements are concrete and visible, they consistently attract media attention while such conceptually abstract issues as Palestinian rejectionism receive almost no attention at all. Media, especially television, rely on optics and emotional reactions and abhor complexity.

Accordingly, anything that brings a focus on settlements reinforces the popular perception that settlements are indeed the stumbling block to a genuine two-state peace agreement that the Palestinians are anxious to accept.

So, the Israeli government announcement that, in response to Abbas' unilateral move at the UN, it intended to build 3,000 housing units including in the highly sensitive zone ("E1") in the West Bank, was seen in the international community, including U.S., as extremely provocative.

Media reaction was swift in rebuking Israel. Although its editorial stand had been very supportive of Israel during its recent war against Hamas' missiles, and when Abbas skirted negotiations by appealing instead to the UN, the Globe and Mail took strong exception in its Dec. 4 editorial to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's declaration on settlement growth.

As the Globe wrote: "When the Palestinian Authority took unilateral action and sought increased status at the United Nations, Canada vigorously denounced the move as a blow to the peace process... Now Israel has announced plans to build homes in controversial settlement on occupied land, a move which, if carried out, threatens to do far more damage to the process."

Despite Netanyahu's assurances (made once again on Dec. 5 in an interview with the German newspaper Die Welt) that settlement growth does not contradict Israel's commitment to a two-state agreement, there's growing skepticism about this, most worryingly by those who have been sympathetic to Israel and have until now given it the benefit of the doubt.

In Israel, several mainstream Israeli journalists and analysts recognize the public relations predicament facing Netanyahu and Israel on this subject.

To mention these issues, it needs to be emphasized, is not to dispute the rights of Jews to live in areas of their historical homeland. Rather, it's to raise valid discussion about the political wisdom of pursuing those rights under any circumstances.

David Horowitz, the highly respected editor of The Times of Israel, argued, in his Dec. 3 column, that the Israeli government announcement of an additional 3,000 housing units "actually undermines the claims of those who regard West Bank settlement as an essential repopulation of historic Jewish territory, and suggests rather that settlement is a tool with which to hammer away relentlessly and spitefully at Palestinian aspirations for statehood."

This, Horowitz claims, only plays into Abbas' desire to "depict Israel as the recalcitrant player, the rejectionist," when the truth is the other way around.

Is Canada saying 'none is too many' to the Roma?

Andy Levy-Aizenkopf
Staff Reporter

The spokesperson for the Roma Community in Canada says her community feels disheartened and frustrated by Canada's new immigration laws.

Gina Csanyi-Robah, executive director of the Toronto Roma Community Centre has harsh criticism for Bill C-31, the Protecting Canada's Immigration System Act, which she criticized as being specifically anti-Roma and which she said seeks to bar her people from entering the country based on a racist philosophy.

She made the comments while speaking at an intercultural discussion at congregation Darchei Noam on Nov. 18.

Csanyi-Robah said the new law, which was highly touted by Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney earlier this year, falsely labels Roma who are seeking entry into Canada as "bogus" claimants linked to human smuggling operations and as criminals who are trying to abuse Canada's welfare system.

"Kenney has succeeded in convincing Canadians that [Roma] are here to take advantage of the country rather than fleeing terrible persecution. By doing so, he's re-victimizing them," Csanyi-Robah said.

The immigration minister has said the new law aims to curb false applications to Canada.

While not referring specifically to Hungarian Roma, in an interview last April with The C/N, Kenney said 95 per cent of all Hungarian refugee claims worldwide target Canada.

They do so to access Canada's generous social benefits and obtain federal work permits, as well as to get supplemental health benefits that exceed what they get in Hungary, he said.

"One would have to be blind to the facts to suggest there aren't other factors at play in this... 'irregular migration.' This [situation] undermines and abuses our immigration system," Kenney said. "Thousands of unqualified claimants consume massive resources and slow down the system for those bona fide claimants that need Canada's protection."

But the Roma community in Canada thinks the new law is rooted in racism.

The stereotype of "the Gypsy" in Canada continues to permeate and be promoted, Csanyi-Robah said.

Second of a two-part series

Case in point: on Sept. 5, Sun TV host Ezra Levant launched into a hateful tirade against the Roma, known pejoratively as Gypsies, on his show The Source.

Sun TV later apologized to viewers.

His comments however, prompted the Toronto Roma Community Centre to launch a hate speech complaint with Toronto police on Oct. 11.

Levant said on his show that "Gypsy culture" is synonymous with "swindlers" and that most Roma make false claims to immigrate to Canada.

"The words 'Gypsy' and 'cheater' have become so interchangeable historically" that they spawned the verb "gypped," he said, adding: "And too many have come here to... gyp us again, to rob us blind, which they have done in Europe for centuries."

His rant continued for about eight more minutes. The investigation into his comments is ongoing, and police have referred it to the Crown attorney's office.

"I am praying that we will receive some justice, finally. The only way to stop this barrage of institutional and media racism is to hold them accountable for their words," Csanyi-Robah said.

According to Kenney's office, Canada receives more asylum claims from the European Union than from Africa or Asia. The top source country for asylum claims is Hungary. Citizenship and Immigration Canada said Hungarians constituted 18 per cent of all claimants to Canada in 2011. It notes that the "vast majority of all asylum claims from the EU are abandoned, withdrawn or rejected." Indeed, between 2009 and 2011, 94 per cent of Hungarian refugee claims were abandoned, withdrawn, or rejected by the IRB. Most of those were Roma.

Bill C-31 will also create a list of "safe countries" – or designated countries of origin (DCOs) – whose asylum claimants would be treated differently, because they hail from democratic countries that protect their citizens.

"Designated countries of origin will be those nations that do not normally produce refugees, that are liberal democracies that respect human rights. The designation process is in no way arbitrary. It would require both well-defined quantitative and qualitative criteria be met. This includes the number of claims that are rejected, abandoned and withdrawn," said Alexis Pavlich, a spokesperson for Kenney.

The list is scheduled for release on Dec. 15. Hungary and the Czech Republic – another country with large numbers of Roma who've applied en masse to Canada – were rumoured to be on it.

In April, prior to the new law's passage, Kenney's office said the new immigration bill would benefit all refugee claimants, regardless of country of origin. It said claimants would still receive IRB hearings based on the merits of their cases and in an expedited fashion.

"Bill C-31 will benefit genuine refugees, as they will receive Canada's protection in a matter of a few short months, compared to the current system, in which they must wait an unacceptable two years," a spokesperson for Kenney, said at the time.

But the shorter wait time isn't an incentive and instead harms claimants' chances of staying in Canada, according to Toronto immigration lawyer Max Berger. He also told The C/N that the new law is designed to "scare" claimants from DCOs, particularly Roma, from applying to Canada.

"Those who do come in large groups may be detained with no review of detention for 14 days and then not again for six months. There will be no right to the new Refugee Appeal Division that claimants from other countries have. There will be expedited hearings in 30 or 45 days after arrival, which is hardly enough time to retain counsel and prepare," he said. "Even those who win their refugee claims will not be able to get permanent residence or sponsor their spouses or children for five years."

"The DCO label is like a scarlet letter that sends a message to refugee board judges that these claims ought to be rejected."

The law has other detractors as well, including the Canadian Civil Liberties Union, the Canadian Association of Refugee Lawyers (CARL), and Jewish Immigration Aid Services (JIAS) Toronto, among others. All of them contend that provisions in the law give too much power to ministers and don't give refugees enough time to establish their cases before Canada's Immigration Refugee Board (IRB).

Echoing Csanyi-Robah's sentiments, they also all claim the government is not properly taking into account the reasons behind the surge in Roma applicants.

On Dec. 6, CARL said it was preparing to challenge the law in court.

"There will be many constitutional challenges to the new provisions, including the DCO list, that will be argued by many lawyers, including myself," Berger said.

According to EU statistics and reports, the Roma community continues to struggle with institutionalized discrimination. Its children are placed in segregated schools, forced evictions from homes are ongoing, and its women endure forced sterilization at the hands of the state.

"[Roma] are living in the same kind of abject poverty that can be found in sub-Saharan Africa. And that same filter of information still exists" in the western media, Csanyi-Robah said. "We don't have an accurate reflection of the reality of the Roma in Europe anywhere in our media in Canada."

Last April, Kenney said he believed many claimants, specifically Roma from Hungary, were making false claims and abusing Canada's refugee system.

IRB statistics show a spike in Roma claims from 2010 to 2012. Roma from the Czech Republic and Slovakia have also been trying to reach Canada in greater numbers since the mid-2000s, though Czech Republic claims have dropped since Canada put a visa requirement on the country in 2009.

Hungarian Jews are also starting to feel skittish about an increasingly xenophobic landscape in Europe.

The rise of neo-Nazism, particularly in Hungary, where the ultranationalist Jobbik party and its paramilitary groups constantly harass Roma and Jews, is creating new fears among ethnic minorities there, Csanyi-Robah said.

We should acknowledge their sacrifice

It's that time of year again. Christmas decorations are popping up everywhere and every-other song on the radio is about jingle bells, silent nights or reindeer. We can't escape it! We Jews often complain about how Christmas takes over everything – and not just on Dec. 25, but from just after Halloween to after New Year's Eve!

For Jews-by-birth, it is an annual tradition to complain about the prevalence of Christmas. But how often have we stopped to think about how Christmas affects those members of our families who have either converted or decided to join our families?

Toronto Jews are proud. We don't hide our heritage and we educate others about it. Yet this pride can be chauvinistic or elitist.

Many parents of intermarried children are embarrassed that their child has "married out" and try to hide this from their friends and synagogue communities. Those who have "married out" are looked down upon as if they didn't achieve the ideal marriage – even if the spouse is wonderful and a perfect match, there is still a sense of loss and failure.

Let's flip our perspective. Joining the Jewish community takes years of study and soul-searching in order to decide to abandon one's religion and embrace another. It means putting the heirloom Christmas decorations into a box and never taking them out again. It means not passing on beloved customs from one generation to the next.

Parashat Miketz always falls during this time of year. We learn that Joseph was assimilated into Egyptian society, took on an Egyptian name, dressed like an Egyptian and spoke the language. He marries Asenath, daughter of an Egyptian priest. A few chapters later, Joseph brings their two sons to receive a blessing from his father, Jacob, and to be inducted into the family tradition.

Let's flip our perspective. Asenath is lucky enough to marry one of the most handsome, strong and desirable men in the land – he is powerful as Pharaoh's right hand man and he has fully embraced Egyptian culture. Effectively, he has "converted" to the Egyptian way of life. (Though he never abandons the God of his father.) Joseph is a catch!

Then, all of a sudden, his family shows up. They are ragged and poor – hardly the nobility to which Asenath is accustomed. They have strange traditions and speak a strange language. Could Asenath ever have imagined such in-laws?

Her husband decides that their sons will now be raised in his ancestral tradition and gives them to his father. What does Asenath say or do? Does she object or consent? We do not know. The Torah is silent.

This is clearly not what Asenath signed up for in marrying Joseph. And yet, regardless of what her reaction may have been initially, in the end, her sons become fathers of two tribes of Israel. Asenath has, through her agreement or silence, given permission for her children to be raised in a tradition not her own.

Nowhere is Asenath acknowledged for her generous sacrifice. She gave her most precious things in the world to a foreign people and tradition. She strengthened our community and receives no credit for it.

We have many Asenaths in our midst: non-Jewish parents raising Jewish children, supporting their Jewish education, celebrating the Jewish milestones of their lives, embracing new traditions. We have Jews-by-choice who have given up their faith for ours and add strength to the Jewish People. Even though they chose this life, with every change there is a sense of loss. Think of moving from our childhood home. It was time to move on, yet we still miss that house with all of its memories.

At Christmastime, these righteous and generous partners in our midst are reminded of what they have given up. This year, let us acknowledge their contribution to strengthening our people. Let's remember to say thank you, not to take their involvement for granted as if we, by our good graces, allow them to sit at our table.

We owe them a debt of gratitude – not only for giving up what they had, but for embracing what we have to offer and enabling it to pass to the next generation. This year, when we hear the carols and see our streets aglow, may we remember to offer the goodness of Judaism generously and with thanks.

"קוורטט מאוחר" הוא סרטו של הישראלי ירון זילברמן ואתו המפיקה תמר אשל. היו בעשור האחרון די הרבה סרטים ישראלים מעולים, כולל כמה מועמדים לפרס האוסקר, ולמרות זאת "קוורטט מאוחר" יוצר שיא חדש ומרשים לסרט ישראלי: כל קדמיו הופקו בארץ עם שחקנים ישראלים באולפנים ישראלים. הסרט הזה הופק בנוי וזרק על די צוות אמריקאי באולפן אמריקאי, עם חמישית שחקנים ענקיים באיכות של אוסקר, ובראשם סימון הופמן המדהים. כל זה אומר שהבמאי והמפיקה הישראלים שיקנו את צמרת הבינון באיכות הסרט שלהם. והם צדקו בגדול.

זהו סיפור של רביעיית מוזיקה קאמרית שמועלת מבית ספר ג'וליאד המפורסם בניו יורק, ועל היחסים הסובבים ביניהם אחרי עשרים וחמש שנה בצמרת הענף. הכל מתחיל כשהצ'לן שלהם, שמבוגר מהאחרים בעשרים שנה, מגלה שחלה במחלת פרקינסון ויש סיכון רב שלא יוכל להמשיך לנגן. העלילה המסתובבת מסובכת על רקע קוורטט נצחי של בטחון שקשה מאוד לביצוע.

אינני מתכוון לקלקל לכם את העלילה. רק אומר שזה אחד הסרטים הכי שלמים שראיתי בחיי, זה שהוא נוצר על ידי ישראל בן 46 ואשתו לוי להתרשנות רבה. אחת עשרה שעות (קוין) (שבדרך כלל הולך מ-0 עד 10).

The virtual war of words, Part 1

It was the tweet heard around the world. On Nov. 14, the Israel Defence Forces killed Ahmed Jabari, head of Hamas' military wing, and delivered the news via Twitter - along with a YouTube video of Jabari's car exploding.

Since then, the video, IDF Pinpoint Strike on Ahmed Jabari, has garnered more than 4.6 million views. (<http://bit.ly/yrfgoe>)

As violence escalated between Israel and Gaza, a parallel, virtual war was taking place on computers, phone and tablets around the globe. Both sides were turning to social-media tools such as Twitter and Facebook to get their message across. The rockets and bombings may have subsided, but the use of social media by the combatants continues.

Another widely reported tweet from the @IDFSpokesperson carried this none-too-subtle message: "We recommend that no Hamas operatives, whether low level or senior leaders, show their faces above ground in the days ahead." And in a fascinating use of social media, the Alqassam Brigades Twitter account actually retweeted the IDF message and then responded with one of its own, "Our blessed hands will reach your leaders and soldiers wherever they are (You Opened Hell Gates on Yourselves)." (<http://bit.ly/istweet1>)

The use of these networking tools did not start in November. Rebecca Stein, a professor of anthropology at Duke University, has researched how Israeli military officials have been using social media. She told Reuters' Gerry Shih that in 2008 "Operation Cast Lead marked the first time the Israelis 'weaponized' social media. But back then it was very improvisational." And then in 2010, the Israeli government seemed to be caught off guard when activists on a humanitarian convoy bound for the Gaza Strip stirred up sympathy by tweeting and webcasting from their boats after they were boarded by Israeli troops. Shih writes, "That year, the Israeli foreign ministry invested more than $15 million to better grasp how the government could use social media in a broader campaign to burnish the nation's image." (<http://bit.ly/istweet2>)

Not all tweets are designed to trumpet its side's strength. Will Ward, writing for ArabMediaSociety.com, points out that "groups supporting both Israel and the Palestinians also used social media to do just the opposite, inviting supporters to advertise their side's plight on the social networking site Facebook." Ward explains that "users were asked to 'donate their status,' that would automatically display an up-to-the-minute tally of the rockets hitting southern Israel or a running count of the Palestinian dead and wounded... The Jerusalem Post reported that 10,000 users signed up to display the 'Qassam count' in the conflict's first three days." (<http://bit.ly/istweet3>)

Ironically, sometimes information can do more harm than good. Several days into the conflict, a graphic credited to an Israeli civilian named Eyyatar Tabib was circulated via Twitter. In black print on a blood red background, the note warns Israelis not to divulge the location where missiles landed. It concludes, "The enemy is not stupid. The enemy is listening." The message was reminiscent of the World War II warning, "Loose lips sink ships" updated for the social-media age. (<http://bit.ly/istweet4>)

Next time, the people behind the social-media war and a look at its effectiveness.

Strengthening the chain across generations

There's a famous question regarding the mitzvah of lighting the menorah. Is it a mitzvah that every individual is responsible to perform, or is it a mitzvah that every family must do?

This question has been debated at different times, and many opinions have been given.

The opinion of the Rosh (1259-1327) is that the mitzvah is upon the family.

Family has a central value in Jewish tradition. There are cultures, including our own modern one, that put the individual at the centre of the world, so that the purpose of man is to concentrate on himself and forget about everything else.

In Judaism, the family was always responsible for transmitting the message from generation to generation. Everyone considered himself part of a chain that sees members of the senior generation as emissaries who transmit the message to the next generation, ensuring the future of Am Yisrael.

In the Sephardi tradition, there are many customs that emphasize the importance of family values.

My wife recalls as a child growing in Montreal a large family who prayed at the same synagogue as her family. Upon the Birkat Kohanim (priestly blessing) being recited, all the children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren went under the great-grandfather's tallit to get his blessing. It was an unforgettable sight that marked my wife for the rest of her life. It's something my wife encourages our children to do, asking them to cover themselves with my tallit every time the Birkat Kohanim is recited.

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Another custom that I dearly cherish is to kiss one's parents hands every Friday night and the chacham's hand every time we greet him.

This custom is based on tractate Avodah Zarah (17a), where the Talmud recalls that when Ulah, who was a talmudic scholar, would return from the beit midrash (study house), he would kiss his father's hands. Rashi explains that it was customary that when one left the synagogue, he would kiss the top of the hands of his parents and those greater than him.

The holy Zohar (Parshat Lech Lecha) states that Rabbi Elazar, son of Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai, would kiss his father's hands, as would other students of Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai.

The Arizal (Rabbi Isaac Luria, in Sha'ar HaKavanot) adds that even if one does not live with one's parents, nevertheless, if it's possible to go visit them, kiss their hands and request their blessing, it is proper to do so.

Another prevalent Sephardi custom, based on the Talmud Shabbat, is to name a newborn baby after a living relative. It's a sign of honour that emphasizes the continuity and future of the family.

I believe that only out of this tight relationship between generations can we ensure that the chain won't break.

Let us all be inspired by these divine customs and bring up a generation of proud and dedicated Jews.

May HaShem grant us wisdom, love and inner peace to guide our children in the proper path through the lesson of the menorah.

What's the blessing for returning to earth?

In the opening scene of a recent episode of The Big Bang Theory, Howard Wolowitz, the Jewish mechanical engineer, is returning to earth after a stint on the International Space Station. The Soyuz capsule rattles and rumbles as it barrels earthward, and Howard screams uncontrollably in fear. The Russian cosmonaut sitting next to him yells, "Calm down!" In response Howard sings "Baruch Atah Adonai, Eloheinu Melech haolam, hamotzi lechem min haaretz." Mike, the American astronaut asks, "What's that?" and Howard replies, "The Jewish prayer for eating bread! We don't have one for falling out of space!"

He's right. We don't have a prayer for falling out of space, but should we?

The misappropriation of blessings is too common in Jewish education.

Two summers ago, I visited a Jewish day camp where the educators had set up a compost heap. Hanging above the pile of table scraps and grass cuttings was a large sign with the blessing, "Baruch Atah Adonai, mechayev hametim" – "Blessed are You, God, who revives the dead." The second brachah of the Amidah, recited three times each day, speaks of the resurrection of the dead during messianic times, a central tenant of traditional Judaism set out in Ezekiel's vision of the valley of dry bones. But the blessing can hardly be construed as a reference to the compost cycle.

A few years earlier, I was on a hike with a leading Jewish nature educator when our students came upon an injured snail in the middle of the path. As we crowded around the debilitexts to bring meaning to our contemporary lives. In public celebrations and private introspection, we turn to the centuries-old words of the siddur to root our innermost thoughts in tradition.

As an educator, I am at once disappointed by the compost heap and the snail encounter, but encouraged by Wolowitz.

Excellent educators envisioned Jewish tropes in the compost heap and reacted to the encounter with the snail with an eye toward teaching Jewish values. But their responses overreached. In doing so, they jeopardized the authenticity of the text and the way learners connect to the rich Jewish canon.

Wolowitz, on the other hand, reached into the deepest places of his Jewish knowledge and authentically pulled words that spoke to him at the moment he most needed them. While his selection of a blessing seems odd, for him it was the right text at the right time.

There's no need for a blessing for landing a spaceship. Wolowitz found words that are imbued meaning. But there's a need to carefully consider the ways we teach our students to use texts as touchstones for connecting their lives to the canon of tradition.

Class Act
Daniel Held

tated snail, the educator urged us to "back away! It's pikuach nefesh." Pikuach nefesh is the cornerstone Jewish principle that the preservation of human life overrides virtually any other religious consideration. The educator could have enacted the mitzvah of tzaar baalei chayim, concern for the welfare of animals, instead of granting the snail a soul akin to that of a human. But he didn't.

Texts are the backbone of our study and our prayer. We pour over millennia-old verses of biblical and rabbinic

Baycrest exhibits Mosaic Menorah

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Mosaic Menorah is now on exhibit at Baycrest as part of a permanent art installation there.

This intergenerational art project took two years to complete. Many of the people who call Baycrest home helped to create it, along with volunteers and staff.

The colourful menorah, designed by Brenda Gasner Lass, started out as a six-foot-high wood structure. Each tile was hand-fashioned from clay, and painted and glazed by Baycrest residents.

The technique used to make the menorah's tiles is the same one that's used to produce bowls, trays, vases and other pottery produced in the Apotex Creative Arts Studio. Gasner Lass said, "It's a technique that utilizes a series of steps that are easy for our residents to employ, even with a multitude of varying abilities."

"The menorah is meant to look alive, and full of vibrant colours. Just like the people who call Baycrest their home. It is like the tree of life, sitting in a giant flower pot, made to invoke the look of the therapeutic work done in the Apotex Creative Arts Studio."

Gasner Lass said that Baycrest was to use the Mosaic Menorah for the first time on the first night of Chanukah, Dec. 8, when Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue was to make a musical Chanukah Havdalah for Baycrest residents and their families.

Culinary battle raises funds for hospital

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Some 450 food enthusiasts gathered at The Fairmont Royal York Hotel Dec. 1 for the third annual Chef's Challenge – The Ultimate Battle For a Cure, held by the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary.

Participants in the challenge cooked alongside host and celebrity chef, Guy Fieri, along with Food Network Canada star chefs Lynn Crawford, Chuck Hughes, Mark McEwan, David Rocco and Michael Smith.

"This cause is very important to me. I lost my sister, Morgan, to cancer, a year and a half ago. It doesn't matter who you are: cancer has no prejudice," said Fieri, the evening's host, who is known for his hit series Diners, Drive-Ins and Dives.

No tickets were sold for the event, but spectators and participants were required to raise a minimum of $2,500. The top 50 fundraisers earned a spot to compete on stage, and the top 25 attended a VIP brunch at a private home the next day, together with top sponsors and celebrity chefs. The evening also included a live and a silent auction.

Funds raised at the event, co-chaired by Simmie Frieberg Antlick and Ivy Knight and presented by World MasterCard, will be used for breast and ovarian cancer research and education at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute and the Marvella Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Fieri's five-course dinner began with Crispy Tartare Trio and included Pepito Crusted Halibut, Niagara ice wine, pomegranate sorbet, steak Diane and Baklava Cigars. Meanwhile, the competition was unfolding on stage.

For the competition, the top 50 fundraisers were divided into five teams. Each celebrity chef was randomly assigned 10 culinary participants who competed in the battle, which involved the preparation of three courses within a given time limit.

The chefs were not allowed to touch the food or the equipment, although they were able to give instructions. In the past two competitions, participants worked from a recipe supplied by the hosting chef, but this year, teams had to create their recipe on the spot.

The twist was a mystery ingredient that had to be included in each dish, announced by Fieri at the beginning of each round.

After every round, the team chef leaders presented their creations to the panel of celebrity judges, media personalities Kris Reyes, Antony Robart, Michele Henry, Amy Rosen and John Moore, who scored the dish based on taste, creativity, and presentation. All tasting was blind – the judges did not know who prepared any dishes.

Chef Lynn Crawford and her team won the challenge for the second time. She also won in 2010.

Food Network chef Corbin Tomaszkeski said that food should do one of two things: "create memorable experiences or remind oneself of an unforgettable time."

He followed that principle when he led the audience in a cupcake challenge in which guests decorated cupcakes with a supply of confectionery.

Participant Tania Chugani Green, a lawyer from Montreal who is passionate about cooking, said, "I am proud to [be] a participant in the Chef's Challenge since its inception and am one of the top 10 fundraisers this year. You meet amazing people from all walks of life who have a common passion. There is nothing like it. The fun factor is huge, but we still have that competitive edge."

"If you want to work in this industry, you have to be passionate, it's a labour of love," said chef Hughes.

Chef Michael Smith, an advocate for simple, sustainable home cooking, recommended his Stovetop Mac and Cheese with Broccoli recipe because it is "Easy to make, healthy and perfect for families."

Children write about the Holocaust

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Students from Fieldstone Day School in Toronto recently listened to Kathy Kacer talk about her eighth book on Holocaust remembrance for children, We Are Their Voice.

Kacer is not the book's sole author, as the book is primarily written by 85 school-children in the form of personal essays on the Holocaust. Some of the child authors wrote essays as the voice of child survivors, while others wrote personal commentaries about survivors.

The book was a two-year project for which Kacer collaborated with educators and principals from 45 schools, primarily from Canada and the United States. Six educators and Kacer judged each essay before selecting the 85 essays from 125 submissions.

"This book may be the best one of all that I wrote, even though I was more the editor than author. We Are Their Voice fulfills my personal mandate to pass on the torch of responsibility for remembering the Holocaust to the next generation of children," said Kacer.

Included among the essays in the book are moving dramatic stories such as The Only One Left, in which child author Rachel McCarthy imagines herself to be the last survivor of her family. In the memorable story Courage, child author Shanice Pereira writes to Anne Frank, as if Anne was alive and her best friend.

These child-authored stories are testimonies to the skill of each author to place himself or herself in the minds of Holocaust survivors. Survivor John Freund, now 82, spoke to the children about how he, at the age of nine, was one of 69 Jewish boys who were slave labourers at the Auschwitz concentration camp from 1939 to 1945. His family, who were from Czechoslovakia, was murdered at the camp.

"I was forced to do unthinkable things for Dr. Josef Mengele, who spared us from dying, but [we] had to watch torture every day. I felt like I was watching the devil at work," said Freund.

He was liberated by American troops and immigrated to Toronto in 1948, where he became an accountant. Freund has three daughters and 10 grandchildren. He wrote his autobiography, Spring's End, in 2006.

Schwab Gelbard never saw a concentration camp, but shared with the children her own personal horrors of overcoming fear, loneliness and mistrust of strangers. Her father, who smuggled her out of Vienna, was sent to a concentration camp. Schwab Gelbard's mother moved her and her young brother to Belgium and later France. To protect her children, Schwab Gelbard's mother sent them to a home for Jewish children in southern France.

"My brother and I were protected with other Jewish children in a small town in France by pretending to be Christian. I was baptized. Every day I worried if that the Nazis would discover we are Jewish, but was also blessed that the whole town of France knew of Jewish children being protected from the Nazis and took chances on their own lives to protect us," said Schwab Gelbard, now 80. She lives in Toronto and has four children and nine grandchildren.

More of Schwab Gelbard's story of survival can be found in the book Hiding Edith, written in 2009 by Kacer.

Kacer's first book, The Secret Of Gabi's Dresser (1998), tells how Kacer's mother escaped the Nazi concentration camps by hiding in a dresser at her home.

"I come from a family of survivors who were willing to talk about what they went through," she said. "There are so many survivors willing to speak and whom I met over the years that there is no shortage of stories for me to write about in the future."

Kacer has won numerous awards for her books over the years.

She worked for 20 years as a psychologist before becoming an author in 1997. Kacer is married to attorney Ian Epstein. Her son is actor Jake Epstein, best known for his work on the television series De-Grassi: The Next Generation. Her daughter, Gabi, is a jazz singer and actor who recently recorded her CD Show Off.

We Are Their Voice is published by Second Story Press.

and Zionist students at York University is, sadly, not a new or surprising phenomenon. In 2009, pro-Israel supporters were pushed into the Hillel offices by a mob – led by a vice-president of the York Federation of Students (YFS) – chanting antisemitic slogans.

In 2010, Hamas supporter George Galloway was invited to speak on campus by this same undergraduate student union. Rather than refusing to provide Galloway with a platform, the university saved its moral outrage and legal threats for the Toronto rabbi who rightfully accused the university of tolerating antisemitism and ignoring the safety concerns of Jewish students.

Last month, these patterns were continued when the York University Graduate Students' Association endorsed the boycott, divestment, and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel.

The BDS campaign is backed by York's Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) group, which is currently circulating a petition urging the YFS, which represents 52,000 undergraduates, to endorse the motion as well. They require 5,000 signatures, or approximately 10 per cent of the student body, to get the council to vote on the measure.

Although SAIA hides its agenda behind human rights rhetoric and appeals for justice, it misleads students with euphemisms that question Israel's inherent right to exist, but these euphemisms aren't recognized as such by people unfamiliar with Middle East politics. This is best exemplified (although other cases abound) by a sign prominently posted outside of SAIA's campus office that states "Zionism is RACISM." It goes without saying that such delegitimization techniques entirely eliminate all peace-advancing dialogue from taking place at the university.

The key issue at stake is not Israel's economic future. York's divestment from companies such as Hewlett-Packard and Lockheed Martin clearly won't have any impact on the Israeli economy, and BDS campaigns as a whole are mostly ineffective in this regard. At risk, however, are the thousands of students who will come to associate Israel with apartheid, colonialism and ethnic cleansing; who will be instilled with a hostility and hatred towards the Jewish state, and who, under the premise of supporting equality and humanitarian ideals, will isolate the only democracy in the region while giving tyrannical, abusive regimes such as Syria and Iran a free pass. It's precisely within this kind of atmosphere that moral intellectualism dies and virulent antisemitism rises. At York, it already has.

The problem is further exacerbated by a lack of objective information available to students. While the student unions on campus are dominated by pro-Palestinian agendas and are focused almost exclusively on condemning Israel, no alternative educational avenue exists on campus for those students who want to learn about the other perspective on the conflict, save for tabling efforts by Israel advocacy groups such as Hasbara or Hillel.

How do I know this? I approached the editor of York's student newspaper, the Excalibur, to write an opinion piece against the BDS campaign when news of the graduate students' endorsement first broke. Although the editor was initially enthusiastic about the idea, she refused to run the article when she realized that I had carefully explained – using direct quotes from the BDS campaign's own website – why BDS is hateful and antisemitic. In the height of hypocrisy, the article was deemed too biased.

I was told, too, that the editorial board did not agree with my opinion, despite the newspaper's policy that states clearly, "We love printing articles that express diverse opinions, encourage intellectual debate and serve the interests of the York community." This policy should render such personal disagreements irrelevant. Quite simply, any perspective at York that pokes holes at the distorted and untrue claims propagated by the student union or SAIA is shut down.

The York campus is rapidly becoming a hotbed of intolerance and intimidation instead of an academic institution defined by moral clarity and scholarly debate. The administration has proven time and again that it's not capable of creating an environment of safety and equity for Jewish students. Although York is quick to distance itself from charges of antisemitism, the continual demonization of Israel and the intimidation and harassment of Jewish supporters point to the contrary.

Danielle Shachar is a first-year student at York University.

Sask. teacher learns about prewar European Jewry

Brian Moscovitz
Special to The CJN

SASKATOON — A veteran Saskatchewan educator is overhauling his Holocaust education curriculum to introduce rural students and teachers to the rich tapestry of European Jewish culture before the rise of Nazism.

After participating this past summer in Yad Vashem's international seminar for educators titled "Teaching the Shoah and Antisemitism," Larry Mikulcik said he realized the importance of informing students and the public about the nature of pre-Holocaust Jewish culture in eastern Europe.

"I really want to take some time in my course, and in public presentations, to bring out the arts and flavour of Jewish culture pre-Holocaust," said Mikulcik, who has been teaching history to Saskatchewan high school students for more than 25 years.

"I teach in a small rural community that has, up to my knowledge, no people of Jewish ancestry," said Mikulcik, referring to Strathburg, Sask., a town with 752 residents.

"Therefore, we have to ask: what is Jewish culture? I'm now going to take even more time to help my students understand the little bit that I know and learned over the seminar."

Mikulcik, 54, grew up about 45 kilometres south of Saskatoon and said the first time he ever met a Jew was at Saskatoon's Folkfest, an annual multicultural festival held each summer at community centres and places of worship across the city.

The only applicant from the Prairies, Mikulcik joined 41 other educators from across Canada and other countries for the intensive 19-day Hebrew University accredited graduate course geared to giving experienced educators the tools to teach the history and lessons of the Holocaust.

Mikulcik said he became especially interested in how pre-World War II Yiddish and Hebrew literature, theatre and art helped sustain Jewish resistance to persecution in the ghettos and death camps.

"Through a study of the literature, I was able to get much better insight into some of the worldview of the Jewish people of the era, and how they dealt with the destruction of their civilization," said Mikulcik, adding he was "enthralled" with professor Alan Rosen's class on Yiddish literature, which covered works by Sholem Aleichem, S. Ansky and other seminal figures in Yiddish literature.

"From gauging participants' reactions, it's clear that this program leads to dramatic changes in their lives as educators," said Yaron Ashkenazi, executive director of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

Ashkenazi said that over the last five years, more than 160 international educators have travelled to Israel to take the course, which began in 1981 and continues to run with support from the Asper Foundation and private donors to the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

"This intensive program provides educators with techniques for teaching the relevance of the Holocaust in our time, and especially in a multicultural society," Ashkenazi said.

In 2010, Mikulcik participated in the March of the Living educators' tour through Poland and parts of Germany, an experience that led him to apply to the Yad Vashem seminar.

"What I loved about both the March of the Living and the Yad Vashem experiences were that about a third of our group in both cases were Jewish people themselves, either descendants of victims or survivors of the Holocaust," Mikulcik said.

Larry Mikulcik with the old city of Jerusalem in the background

"They were so open about helping us gentiles understand what it means to be Jewish, and the different degrees from ultra-conservative to a more contemporary view of maintaining Jewish faith in the modern world," he said.

Currently, Mikulcik is preparing for speaking engagements around Strathburg, and he's been included in a national committee that's planning a summer conference in Toronto that will bring the program's alumni together.

"Part of my obligation, because I've attended Yad Vashem, is to be involved in public education," he said. "We have fewer and fewer survivors of the events left to testify, and I think it's incumbent on our generation and younger generations to continue to make the truth known."

TOP TALENT: University of Toronto student Jonathan Green, right, won NCSY Canada's first Top Talent Live competition. Green, 20, was among four finalists to perform at the youth organization's Dec. 2 event at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. Numerous Jewish bloggers and activists in Hungary are being targeted for reprisals by neo-Nazi groups for taking part in pro-Roma and counter-Jobbik rallies.

In March, Hungarian-Jewish author Akos Kertesz, 80, fled to Canada and sought asylum. He told the Hungarian News Agency he faced harassment and threats after making controversial statements last summer about Hungary's role in the Holocaust.

Shimon Fogel

In June, the Toronto Board of Rabbis wrote to Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Kenney asking them to reconsider the DCO list, because it might turn away legitimate asylum seekers fleeing persecution, including Jews, from countries such as Hungary, despite growing concerns of rising anti-Semitism and anti-Roma attitudes.

"As Jews, we know that countries where the majority lives in safety can be dangerous for minority groups. Roma people living in Hungary, for example, face persecution that has been documented by the Simon Wiesenthal Center and other human rights groups," the board wrote.

Kenney travelled to Hungary in October to meet with Roma and Jewish leaders there. At the time, his office said he sought to "better understand the nature of discrimination faced by the community and the reasons for a large wave of irregular migration to Canada.

Asked last week whether the meetings have had any impact on Kenney's formulation of the DCO, a spokesperson said no decisions have been made about which countries will appear on the list.

Follow-up questions to Kenney's office asking whether the delay in releasing the DCO was due to Kenney's reconsideration of the situation in Hungary were not answered.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said his group has begun outreach to the Canadian Roma community and that it monitors the situation in Hungary and the EU through its affiliation with the World Jewish Congress (WJC).

"There have historically been co-operative efforts between the Jewish and Roma communities. We haven't met with them formally recently, but it's something we're prepared to do, and we're exploring whether there are things we should do to address some of the challenges they face, which are similar to the problems with perception issues our community has had over the decades," he said.

Last month, WJC president Ronald Lauder slammed Hungarian Prime Minister Viktor Orbán for not taking decisive action against racism and antisemitism.

Particularly galling to the WJC were remarks by Hungary's ambassador to Norway, Géza Jeszenszky, who wrote in a university textbook used at Budapest's Corvinus University that all Roma are mentally ill.

Lauder said it was scandalous that a representative of a democratically elected government "should hold such absurd views on an ethnic community that has lived in his country for many centuries."

Winnipeg congregation aids Jewish refugee from Malaysia

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It has been said that countries don't need a Jewish population as a precondition for preaching antisemitism.

The perfect example is Malaysia, a predominantly Muslim East Asian country whose president has promoted the antisemitic Protocols of the Elders of Zion and other Jewish conspiracy theories despite the paucity of Jewish residents of Malaysia.

What Jews there are in Malaysia live secret lives. One of those Malaysian Jews lives in Winnipeg and is trying to secure refugee status. Her claim was rejected during her first hearing with the Refugee Board of Canada.

Ruth Livingstone, past president of the Reform congregation Temple Shalom, which is backing the refugee claimant, said that while the board found the claimant credible, board members didn't believe her life would be at risk should she return to Malaysia. The claimant would rather not be identified in this article for fear that it might prejudice her case and expose her to harm should she have to return to Malaysia.

"The board members reasoned that although she had faced persecution, she hadn't been tortured," Livingstone said. "They failed to reason that she hadn't been harmed because she and her family kept their Judaism secret."

Livingstone said that she tried to testify at the hearing as a character witness but was not allowed to speak.

The claimant — whose family hails from India — first came to Canada and Winnipeg in 2009. She came to Winnipeg to look after her ailing mother, who received Canadian citizenship five years ago. The claimant began attending Temple Shalom three years ago, Livingstone said.

"She should be the poster child for the perfect immigrant," Livingstone said. "She has a work permit and is working full time. She looks after her mother, and she is actively involved in our congregation. She attends services and has taken part in several of our programs."

"She is an amazing person," Livingstone said.

The claimant is appealing the Refugee Board decision to the Federal Court.

Joy Smith, MP for Kildonan-St. Paul in north Winnipeg, has taken up the case with Immigration Minister Jason Kenney, Livingstone said.

"We [Temple Shalom] held a fundraiser to help pay for her legal expenses," Livingstone said. "We are also collecting names on a petition and organizing a letter-writing campaign on her behalf."

Livingstone said the claimant's passport is being held by Immigration Canada and will be returned to Malaysian officials only if she is forced to return to Malaysia. Without a passport, she can't seek refugee status in any other country.

And if she does have to go back to Malaysia, Livingstone added, she will be held for questioning and possibly face imprisonment and torture for claiming refugee status and being Jewish.

Canada frowns on Israel's settlement plans

Canada believes Israel went too far when it declared its intent to build 3,000 new settlement units in a controversial tract of the West Bank in response to the Palestinians achieving non-member state status at the UN last week.

In a Dec. 1 phone conversation, Prime Minister Stephen Harper told Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that the planned construction of new settlements by Israel hampers prospects for peace, according to a Dec. 6 report in The Globe and Mail. Calls by The C/N to Harper's office for further comment were not immediately returned.

Speaking in the House of Commons during question period on Dec. 5, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird elaborated on Canada's position on Israeli settlement plans.

"The Palestinian Authority's action and provocative rhetoric at the United Nations would obviously elicit a response from Israel. Neither is helpful to advance the cause of peace and we do not support either," he said.

Syrian chemical weapons 'a red line'

Yoel Goldman
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israel's ambassador to the United States on Sunday addressed Israeli fears about potential spillover from the civil war in Syria, telling Fox News that if Syria's chemical weapons fell into the hands of Hezbollah, Israel would consider it a "game changer."

"We are watching the situation very carefully," Michael Oren said. "Syria has a very varied, deep chemical weapons program. It is geographically dispersed as well. Were those weapons to pass into the wrong hands — Hezbollah's hands, for example — that would be a game changer for us."

Last week, U.S. President Barack Obama warned the embattled Syrian President Bashar Assad against using chemical weapons, saying that would be a "red line."

Ambassador Michael Oren

On Sunday, Oren echoed Obama's statement.

"We have a clear red line about those weapons passing into the wrong hands," Oren said. "Can you imagine Hezbollah, with its 70,000 rockets, could get its hands on chemical weapons? That could kill thousands of people."

Still, Strategic Affairs Minister Moshe Ya'alon said Monday that Israel did not currently regard itself as being under threat from Syrian chemical weapons. If that changed, he said, Israel would know what to do in order to protect itself.

Meanwhile, a meeting of the Friends of Israel group was set to begin on Monday in Marrakech, Morocco, without U.S.

Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, who was forced to delay her trip due to a stomach virus.

The Obama administration is expected to recognize the Syrian opposition's new leadership council as the sole legitimate representative of the Syrian people. Clinton is likely to announce that step at a meeting of the international diplomatic collective on Dec. 12.

The State Department said Sunday that Clinton's illness has forced her to move her flight to Morocco from Monday to Tuesday.

The meetings in Marrakech are expected to focus on providing the Syrian opposition with more financial and material support.

UN adopts Israeli resolution

Yifa Yaakov
The Times of Israel

NEW YORK — The UN on Dec. 7 passed an Israeli resolution concerning entrepreneurship as a driving force for development, with 129 countries voting in favour of the resolution, 31 voting against it and nine abstaining.

"Talent is everywhere, opportunity is not," read the slogan on a brochure produced by the Israeli mission to the Concerning the Arab states' opposition to the resolution, Prosor stated that these states had, to his regret, "chosen once again to struggle against a move that was meant to aid them, just because Israel was the one standing behind it."

According to a statement released by the Israeli mission to the UN after the resolution passed, the vote was the first time the UN had passed a resolution concerning entrepreneurship as a method of combating poverty and encouraging growth.

"Entrepreneurship empowers people. It generates solutions and helps communities to overcome old problems with new ways of thinking," read another one of the campaign's brochures. "Entrepreneurship is a major tool for reducing poverty, improving social conditions and confronting environmental challenges." The resolution campaign was accompanied by a diplomatic effort to thwart attempts by Arab member states to have the resolution tabled.

The campaign urged member states to view the concept of "entrepreneurship development" as "a powerful engine that can propel the global agenda forward." The Israeli resolution raised suggestions for several practical methods to promote entrepreneurship in developing countries, such as taking steps to remove the bureaucratic obstacles blocking the entrepreneurs' path and facilitating access to financial services.

"The Israeli spirit of entrepreneurship and creativity prevailed at the UN today. As a state that was founded in difficult circumstances, we have been able to create opportunities for talented people and have become an enterprising superpower," said Ron Prosor,

'Virtual' march marks '87 Soviet Jewry rally

NEW YORK — More than one million people have signed on to join a "virtual" march commemorating the Washington rally 25 years for the Soviet Jewry movement, according to a coalition marking the 1987 event.

Freedom 25, a coalition of 20 organizations, was aiming to attract one million people online to remember Freedom Sunday, when some 250,000 demonstrators gathered on Dec. 6, 1987, to demand that Jews be allowed to leave the Soviet Union. The rally advanced the Soviet Jewry movement, eventually allowing millions of Russian Jews to leave for the United States, Israel and elsewhere, and influenced U.S. foreign policy.

The coalition is hoping to educate a younger generation about the protest, which Freedom 25's founders believe are unaware of the significance it deserves.

"Despite such a record of unprecedented achievement and its enduring effect on contemporary society, Freedom Sunday and the movement in general are for the most part a footnote in history," Daniel Eisenstadt, a founder of Freedom 25 with Michael Granoff, both of Philadelphia, said in a statement. "They are not taught in any elementary or secondary schoolbooks; they aren't even a part of the curriculum at Jewish schools. In short, the history and lessons of the Soviet Jewry movement have slipped off the Jewish and national communal agenda."

Freedom 25 will work with Jewish schools, camps and organizations to integrate education of the event. Its website provides information on the march.

'We cannot recognize Israel's legitimacy'

"We want peace but will not repeat the same mistake of a one-sided withdrawal," Netanyahu said, referring to the removal of Israeli forces and the dismantling of all settlements in Gaza in 2005. He said the Israeli government wants "real peace with our neighbours" but is "under no illusions" and won't, this time, "stick our heads in the sand."

"I have always been astonished at the delusions of others who are prepared to continue this process and call it peace. You would hand over more territory, in this case in Judea and... to the same people, and the result, of course, will be a Gaza on the outskirts of Tel Aviv. Hadera and Kfar Saba," said Netanyahu, vowing "this government won't bow to international pressure and risk Israel's security."

At the Hamas rally in Gaza on Saturday, Meshal promised to liberate Palestine "from the sea to the river," and said that Hamas was "not giving up any inch of Palestine. It will remain Islamic and Arab for us and nobody else. Jihad and armed resistance is the only way... We cannot recognize Israel's legitimacy."

At the main stage in Gaza City, a roaring crowd greeted Meshal and Gaza Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh.

Hamas' green dominated the gathering, where some children wore military uniforms and others carried guns. Masked gunmen holding automatic rifles flanked the podium where Meshal gave his fiery speech.

He said he would continue to secure the release of Palestinian prisoners from Israeli jails, referring to a swap last year when abducted Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit was exchanged for more than 1,000 Palestinian prisoners.

"From the sea to the river, from north to south, we will not give up any part of Palestine. It is our country, our right and our homeland," said the Hamas chief. "We are all one," he added, referring to Palestinians residing in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and inside Israel. "We are all united in the way of resistance."

The 56-year-old Meshal, who left the West Bank as a child and now leads Hamas from the Gulf state of Qatar, entered Gaza on Friday via Egypt, for the first time and after a long exile from Palestinian territory, to attend the mass rally.

Palestinian sources reported that the terror group's supporters from throughout the region had arrived in Gaza to participate in the festivities. Israel Radio said supporters had come from across the Middle East and that 100 Muslims had also travelled from the United Kingdom.

Israel said last Thursday that it did not control who entered Gaza from Egypt. The Foreign Ministry noted that the entry of Meshal and other supporters to Gaza underlined that Israel did not maintain a hermetic land blockade on the strip.

A spokesperson for Hamas' military wing, Izz ad-Din al-Qassam, warned Israelis to prepare their passports.

"We fought the Zionist entity with limited power," he said. "What will happen when we fight with all our might?"

"Zionists, you should prepare your passports and get ready to disappear," he added.

Dragon boat race brings 'benefit campaigns' to Israel

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — The inaugural dragon boat race on the Sea of Galilee last May was such a success that Canadian organizers have raised their expectations for the upcoming sophomore event.

"Last year's event [2012] far exceeded our expectations," Linda Kerzner, chair of the sponsorships committee, told The CJN during her recent visit to Israel. "We're only going to build on the success of last year. Our goal is to have the same number of teams, but we plan on doubling spectators. Last year, we had 2,200 people at the event. This year [2013] we expect to have 5,000 people."

While the sport of dragon boating was considered foreign — and even peculiar — to the Israelis who took part last May, with news of a second festival came a swell of blue-and-white participants who wanted to take part.

The second annual Dragon Boat Israel

Peres tweets Pope

Israeli President Shimon Peres officially welcomed Pope Benedict XVI to the social network Twitter with a personal message, the Associated Press reported. "Your holiness, welcome to Twitter. Our relations with the Vatican are at their best and can form a basis to further peace everywhere," Peres tweeted. Despite Peres's message, relations between the Vatican and Israel have been strained lately. The Vatican warmly welcomed the Palestinians, who recently upgraded to the same UN status as the Vatican, and also published a highly critical article of Israel's recent Jerusalem construction announcement in its daily newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano. The Pope, whose twitter handle is @pontifex, will not be personally tweeting.

Kadima loses two-thirds of MKs

Two-thirds of the Kadima party's 28 lawmakers are leaving the party. Several announced their intentions to leave when the party's elections list was released. The list was created by a party committee rather than through primaries. Seven lawmakers quit Kadima to join Tzipi Livni's new party, Hatnua.

Kadima chairman Shaul Mofaz is number 1 on the Kadima party list, followed by Knesset members Israel Hasson and Yohanan Plesner.

War crimes accusation

Human Rights Watch accused Israel of committing war crimes during the last Gaza war. In a report released Friday, Human Rights Watch said Israel "violated the laws of war" when an airstrike hit the home of the Daloo family in Gaza City on Nov. 18, killing 10 family members and two other civilians. One of the casualties was Mohamed Jamal Dalu, 29, an officer in Gaza's Hamas-controlled police corps. Human Rights Watch says Israel's attack was unlawful because of the large number of civilians killed. The Israeli army said in a statement that it worked to minimize non-combatant casualties and civilians were never targets. The army blamed militants for using civilian buildings as hideouts.

Palestinians turn to Security Council rusalem. In a letter to the Security Council, the UN General Assembly and the UN secretary general, the Palestinian representative to the United Nations said the plans represent "Israel's contemptuous response" to the international body's vote to approve enhanced observer statehood status for the Palestinians. Authorization for the construction planning was made by the nine-member security cabinet on the evening of Nov. 29 in the hours after the General Assembly vote. The housing would be built in the E1 corridor connecting Jerusalem to the large Ma'aleh Adumim settlement, an area that the Palestinians say is necessary to keep the borders of a Palestinian state contiguous. The housing is in the planning stage. Construction is a long way off, according to reports. Palestinian official Nabil Shaath said that the Palestinians would take Israel to the International Criminal Court (ICC) over the E1 plan and the announcement that Israel would withhold $100 million in taxes collected for the Palestinians, which it will apply to the PA's outstanding electric bill. "By continuing these war crimes of settlement activities on our lands and stealing our money, Israel is pushing and forcing us to go to the ICC," Shaath said.

firmated from Canada, Germany and the United States.

It was a Canadian dragon boat team that brought this traditional Chinese team sport to Israel. Based in Ottawa, the team members thought it would be fun to combine their love of dragon boat racing with their love of Israel. That gave birth to Dragon Boat Israel (DBI), a joint Canada-Israel initiative.

But the real reason Kerzner and Debbie Halton-Weiss, chair of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, were in Israel recently was to help the Israeli side of this festival with fundraising.

"We want a parallel steering committee," Halton-Weiss says, explaining that an important part of dragon boating is fundraising.

Last May, the event raised $50,000 for two educational charities: Youth Futures, which provides disadvantaged youth with mentors, and Net@, which trains young people in high tech. This year, the goal is to raise $75,000 for the Bayit Cham (Warm Home) centre for children at risk and the Kav Hazinuk leadership training.

While the goal is to transition the event to be run by organizers in Israel, what Kerzner and Halton-Weiss didn't know was that "benefit campaigns" are still pretty mysterious to Israelis.

"We're helping to create a new model for philanthropy in Israel. People [in Israel] aren't used to giving money to their friends to participate in a fundraising event. We're getting a lot more support," says Kerzner.

Kerzner and Halton-Weiss helped secure the event's first corporate sponsor.

"We're developing a model to help Israelis ask for money for these kinds of events," says Halton-Weiss. "We didn't realize this was a foreign phenomenon for them."

In addition to setting up the infrastructure of the festival, the two Ottawa residents were also busy implementing projects that would use the dragon boats on a year-round basis. In the coming months, the boats will be used regularly by a group of blind paddlers and they'll also be used for corporate team-building fun days.

"We're focusing on developing dragon boating in Israel," says Halton-Weiss. "We're trying to make it a group activity."

And though interest in these long colourful boats is only gaining momentum, there are no plans to purchase more boats just yet. However, there will be more to do this year on the grounds of the festival while participants and fans are waiting between races. Organizers are adding workshops in krav maga (a non-competitive martial art), yoga and wine tasting, as well as children's activities, for the May 2013 event.

"It's going to be a great festival," Halton-Weiss says.

Israeli firm behind popular game app

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — It's one thing to develop an online game, but it's another thing altogether to design one for a major motion picture franchise. And to design one that wins an award from top entertainment industry doyens — as the most entertaining game of the year — is something that most game designers wouldn't dare hope for in their wildest dreams.

But that's exactly the ladder that Israel's Funtactix has climbed. The company that designed the online version of The Hunger Games Adventures, based on the blockbuster movie hit The Hunger Games, was named the best mobile game tied to a TV or film franchise by Variety, the bible of the entertainment industry.

A panel of judges from top gaming, entertainment, and online news sites gave the nod to the Israeli company's offering, which beat out tough competition from other wildly popular games such as The Walking Dead: The Game and Veggie Tales: The League of Incredible Vegetables, both based on popular entertainment franchises.

This is the first year that Variety has awarded the prize. It was given in 10 different categories for excellence and innovation in the entertainment app industry. The awards were distributed at a special dinner Nov. 29 at the Sheraton Universal Hotel in Los Angeles, where the elite of Hollywood's technocracy came to pay tribute to the winners.

The Hunger Games Adventures was originally released last February as a Facebook application. The game was a huge success — with more than five million downloads — and was ranked one of the top five adventure games on Facebook, prompting Funtactix to produce an iPad edition last September. Within days of its release, the app became one of the most popular games in the iTunes App Store.

"It is incredible to see how our game has become a hub which brings together fans of the books and movies. It allows Suzanne Collins, the author of The Hunger Games trilogy of novels, to enjoy constant contact with her fan base," said Yaron Leifenberg, one of the founding partners of Funtactix. "The game will continue to be developed and updated for many more years on a weekly basis, giving players ongoing access to the wonderful world of The Hunger Games."

The Hunger Games movie, one of the biggest box-office films of all time, is based on the first book in the trilogy (three more films based on the books are planned), and describes a bleak post-apocalyptic America in which a decimated population is enslaved to produce goods and services for a decadent Capitol. As punishment for an insurrection years earlier, the 13 districts of the country, now called Panem, must send a teenage boy and girl to fight to the death in the Hunger Games.

The heroine, Katniss Everdeen, finds solace from her difficult life in the forest beyond the electrified fence surrounding her home in District 12, and the online game lets players follow adventures that she, along with the story's other heroes and villains, experiences in the forest.

Funtactix is considered one of the leading social-game companies in Israel. The company creates social computer games based on blockbuster films through close co-operation with leading Hollywood studios such as Lionsgate and Paramount. Some of Funtactix's earlier games include Mission Impossible IV and Rango, both based on popular films. Established in 2006, Funtactix has 30 employees in its various offices in Israel and the United States.

Funtactix is a portfolio company of Jerusalem Venture Partners (JVP), an Israeli venture capital firm that has made a commitment to content development, seeing content as emerging as a strong growth sector for Israeli companies in the coming years. Among the other content companies in which JVP has invested are Animation Lab, which develops animated films, and AnyClip, which lets users search in a database for their favorite movie clips.

"One of the most important decisions we made several years ago at JVP was to develop and invest in the field of digital media," said Gadi Tirosh, JVP's general partner and a Funtactix board member.

"Investments in Funtactix have certainly proved their worth. JVP will continue to lead in this field."

Aussie company buys stake in Leviathan field

A gas rig in the Mediterranean
(Flash90 photo)

Gabe Fisher
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Australia's largest natural gas and oil company, Woodside Petroleum, has taken a 30 per cent stake in Israel's Leviathan offshore gas drilling operation.

Leviathan will pay up to $2.5 billion (all figures US) for the stake, contradicting earlier reports that the deal was valued at only $1.2 billion. According to terms of the agreement, Leviathan is valued at some $8.3 billion.

"Leviathan is truly a world-class field that offers significant development opportunities through the growing Israeli domestic gas market and Asian and European export markets," Woodside CEO Peter Coleman said in a statement, praising Leviathan as "one of the biggest recent gas discoveries worldwide."

Located in the Mediterranean 130 km west of Haifa, Leviathan is estimated to contain up to 17 trillion cubic feet of usable natural gas, making it one of the largest fields in the world.

Shares in Leviathan, one of several gas fields off the shore of Israel discovered within the last few years, are now divided between Israel's Delek Group (which has a majority stake), Noble Energy of Texas, and Ratio Oil Exploration of Israel. Each of those companies will transfer a percentage of their stake to Woodside as part of the deal. The agreement also makes Woodside a strategic partner in the drilling process.

Leviathan's discovery in 2010 raised political tension between Israel and Lebanon, because it is near the disputed borderline between the countries' territorial waters. Lebanon later retracted a claim that the field was inside its waters.

Initial production for the Israeli gas market is slated for 2016.

According to the U.S. Geological Survey, the subsea area, or the Levantine Basin, that runs northward from Egypt to Turkey, contains upward of 120 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, and reserves in Israeli territorial waters account for some 40 per cent of that total.

Leonard Cohen puts on a stellar performance

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Men of his age and perhaps dosage are settling into retirement, winding down to pursue hobbies, spend winters in Florida, travel to exotic locales and renew relationships with children and childhood friends.

Troubadour Leonard Cohen, Canada's internationally recognized man of words, defies this kind of facile conformist categorization.

Well into his 70s, he is still belting out searing songs of love, loss, yearning and retrospection, winning new fans and satisfying old ones in the process.

Last week, at the cavernous Air Canada Centre, where the slap of hockey pucks and the bounce of basketballs are normally heard, Cohen was in high performance mode, stopping in Toronto for two nights on his Old Ideas North American concert tour.

He didn't quite fill the auditorium, his star power notwithstanding, but the place felt full as a roar of approval rose up from the audience as he bounded on to the stage and approached the microphone.

The crowd, almost evenly divided between aging baby boomers and millennials and generation Xers, was a microcosm of Cohen's diverse fan base.

Cohen, a son of Montreal, was nattily dressed in a dark suit and a fedora as he launched into his first number, Dance Me to the End of Love.

He sang in his trademark style, a low, growling whisper that was at once intimate and distant.

Basking in the thunderous ovation, and lit up by two powerful spotlights cutting through the darkness, Cohen thanked everyone for the warm welcome.

"We've been on the road for quite a while," he said in reference to the tour that ends later this month.

Sounding a plaintive note of mortality, he added, "We may or may not see each other again."

As if to assuage fans who fear they may never see him again, he said, "I promise you we'll give you everything we've got." With that, a middle-aged woman next to me burst out, "Even at 78, he's sexy."

At 78, Leonard Cohen still delivers the goods.

As he performed the next few songs, accompanied by a chorus of three women in black outfits with lovely voices, Cohen dropped to his knees occasionally and knelt on a carpet in apparent supplication.

Between songs, he removed his fedora, revealing a lined and sensitive face, and introduced the members of his band, hailing from all corners of the world.

His rendition of Everybody Knows, which he expressly wrote for the Canadian film Exotica, was pitch perfect, an ode to his talent as a published poet.

"Everybody knows the dice are loaded/ Everybody knows the fight is fixed/Everybody knows the boat is leaking."

"Love you, Leonard," an anonymous woman shouted out in near delirium.

After a 20-minute intermission, Cohen was back in full-throated flight, singing perennial favourites such as Ain't No Cure for Love and Suzanne.

Cohen, his aura as a legendary ladies man shining through, continually harped on his advancing years.

"I'm old, but I'm still into that, a 1,000 kisses deep," he said slyly in a knowing nod to one of his songs.

Still later, he crooned, "I ache in the places I used to play." And then, in a tacit confession, he moaned, "I'd like to hold you, baby, but my arms are old and weak."

Cohen's ability to connect was on display yet again when he performed the classic, I'm Your Man.

"I'll step into the rain for you/ I will steal for you/ I'll disappear for you/ If you want a lover, I'll do anything you ask for."

With the three-hour concert reaching its finale, Cohen injected new life into Hallelujah, one of his signature tunes.

"Thank you so much for your hospitality," he said, finishing his last number in strong and indefatigable fashion. "I do so appreciate it."

He returned for an encore, prompting rapturous applause for a Canadian icon.

PLAY ABOUT ISRAEL COMING TO FACTORY THEATRE

Toronto Fringe's Next Stage Festival presents The Peace Maker, a play by Natasha Greenblatt about a young Canadian Jewish idealist who travels to Israel on a Birthright trip to make sense of the conflict for herself. She also visits the Palestinian territories as she wrestles with ideas of identity and justice and peace-making, all to the accompaniment of a live band spinning out klezmer, Arabic and other music.

Next Stage also offers Pitch Blond, a lighthearted comedy that explores Jewish actor Judy Holliday's early career and her "best performance" before the McCarthy inquisitors who questioned her about her Communist sympathies. Actor-playwright Laura Anne Harris has won accolades for this performance that demonstrates just how clever one needs to be to play the ditzy blond.

Factory Theatre, 125 Bathurst St. Jan. 2 to 13. Visit <http://fringetoronto.com> and click on "Next Stage Festival."

Beatle Ballads: Toronto Beach residents Martin Gladstone and Frank Caruso have released a new CD titled Beatle Ballads, comprising 17 timeless Beatle standards, with guest artist Brenton Chan on cello. Martin was the founder and lead singer in the popular "Beatle clone" band The Grottybeats of the 1980s and works as a lawyer when not attending to his musical and political activities. He is a brother to the compiler of this column. The CD is available for sale at www.cdbaby.com, and a portion of proceeds will be donated to the Friends of Glen Davis Ravine. www.martinandfrank.com

Come to the Cabaret: Veteran singer Gloria Valentine and pianist Nina Shapilsky perform a Jewish Music Cabaret with songs in Yiddish and English in a program sponsored by UJPO (United Jewish People's Order), the Winchevsky Centre and the Yiddish Vinkl. $10 in advance, $15 at the door, includes refreshments. Singer Amy Sky hosts cancer research fundraiser

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Canadian singer-songwriter Amy Sky, whose mother died of cancer, hosted the recent Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) event, an evening of music and storytelling at Glenn Gould Studio in Toronto.

"Cancer took my mom, Sandy Shiner, from our family," Sky said. "Her first yahrzeit is Nov. 29, so, naturally she is on my mind. Every time I am engaged in activities that help others, I know that this is, in part, my mother's legacy of caregiving that she passed on to me. She was also a music lover – she lived for the arts. This evening would have been doubly rewarding for her – music and a meaningful cause."

A Toronto native, Sky burst into the national limelight in 1996 with her debut recording Cool Rain, which achieved gold status in Canada for record sales and spawned four hit singles, including I Will Take Care of You.

Sky also writes songs for dozens of international recording stars, including Anne Murray, Reba McEntire, Diana Ross and Olivia Newton-John.

As both a writer and performer, Amy has been nominated for Juno, SOCAN, Canadian Independent Music and American Songwriting awards, among others.

Her opening number, Help Me To Heal, was written by Sky and Newton-John for Newton-John's 2010 CD, Grace and Gratitude Renewed.

"I had the good fortune to be with Olivia Newton-John when she gave the song's world premiere at the Kennedy Center in 2010 at the first-ever Susan G. Komen Awards Gala," Sky said.

"I saw a roomful of well-known cancer survivors and advocates, in addition to Olivia, who is herself a survivor. I reflected that these people gathered there that night because of the promise that Nancy Brinker had made to her dying sister, Susan Komen, to do everything in her power to end breast cancer forever. That promise launched the Global Breast Cancer Movement, and it reminded me of Margaret Mead's well-known quote, 'Never doubt that a small group of thoughtful committed citizens can change the world. Indeed, it is the only thing that ever has.'"

"Looking around the room here tonight, I feel the same energy, the same belief and commitment to fund the research that will make the breakthroughs that will save countless lives in years to come."

The guests at the fundraiser received Sky's latest CD, Alive and Awake, a collection of songs chosen to reflect Amy's belief that art and music can be tremendously healing.

Sky devotes a great deal of her time to women's health issues and has spoken out extensively on her own experience with postpartum depression.

Her husband, singer-songwriter Marc Jordan, also entertained the crowd with his group, Lunch At Allen's, an ensemble that features veteran performers and songwriters Ian Thomas, Cindy Church and Murray McLauchlan.

Around $150,000 was raised for cancer research that evening.

Book gives a voice to Toronto writers

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

As a reaction to recent government cuts in arts funding, a group of writers are hoping to showcase the strength of the Toronto arts community and introduce people to writers who live, or have lived, in the city.

They also wanted to give their fellow artists a platform for their work.

"Sometimes writing can be a solitary endeavour," said Jenna Harris, creator and editor of a new book, City Voices: A Book of Monologues by Toronto Artists. "[This book is] something that can bring people together to strengthen the network of these individual artists."

Harris, who is originally from Kingston, Ont., lived in New York City before moving to Toronto several years ago. When she discovered that it was sometimes difficult for artists to share their work, she created a project that would showcase work from artists with different backgrounds and careers.

"It's an industry where I realize you do need to create your own opportunities or people won't know you're there or the work you're doing," she said.

In the book, 28 writers share two-minute-long monologues that range in style from theatrical to spoken word and poetry, Harris said. Some of the monologues are based on plays the authors wrote, but the material is all brand new.

Harris said this kind of book is especially necessary, given that Toronto has not been particularly supportive of its arts scene in recent years.

Arts funding is vital to show artists that their work is valued, Harris explained.

"This is who I am. It's what I do, but it's also what feeds me on a daily basis," she said of her work. "When that [support] goes away, it does feel like what artists are doing isn't worthy."

Adding to the political nature of the book, the editors approached NDP member of Parliament Olivia Chow to write a foreword. Harris said they chose her because of her ongoing support for the arts.

Chow wrote her introduction in the form of a monologue, portraying herself as a character talking about Toronto and the fantastic arts community, Harris said.

Despite focusing the book on Toronto's art scene, none of the three editors grew up in the city, noted co-editor Ronit Rubenstein, who is from Montreal. The third editor is Anila Pant, who grew up in Kingston, Ont.

"I think we've all really found a lot to appreciate about the arts scene here," Rubenstein said, citing its vibrancy and its youth.

At the same time, it's hard, when you are just starting out, to know how to get your work out there, she said. So this project will hopefully give young writers a chance to see their work in print.

One of the big concerns at the start of the project was whether there would be enough authors interested in submitting a monologue to a self-published collection, Harris said. But she put out the word and received 150 submissions, which she said proved to her there was a need for this type of project.

In order to ensure the monologues were picked based on merit and not influenced by a writer's reputation, the editors read all monologues without knowing the author, Rubenstein said.

The writers they selected range in age from 13 to over 80, Harris said. Some are seasoned writers, while others are relatively new.

Kat Sandler, for example, is one of the more experienced of the group. Her 2012 Fringe Festival production, Help Yourself, won the Fringe New Play contest.

Rubenstein said she hopes readers will learn about the community of writers in the city who are writing plays that they may enjoy, and perhaps in the future, they'll be drawn to see a performance if they recognize a name from the book. But it's not just for locals, she added. Anyone can curl up with it and enjoy it for the most part.

"We've created [the book] as a journey. So you start with one monologue and it leads into another as if you're reading a short story," Harris said. "This really is a showcase of the type of people who are speaking out in our city in 2012, and we hope that the diversity within it is reflective of Toronto."

Illustrated histories of New Mexico and Israel

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

El Illuminado, A Graphic Novel (Basic Books) is a humorous yet informative look at the history of the Crypto-Jews of New Mexico.

Written by Ilan Stavans, who's known primarily for his funny translation of Don Quixote into Spanglish – the Spanish-English hybrid spoken by many Americans – the book reveals how the region's roots are far more Jewish than most people think.

The main character in this story is the author himself, a real-life professor at Amherst College in Massachusetts. The story has him visiting New Mexico to deliver a lecture on Crypto-Jews, Jews who were force converted to Christianity but continued to practise in secret during the Inquisition.

After the lecture, he is approached by a woman who tells him about Rolando, her cousin, who died under mysterious circumstances recently. Rolando, she tells him, believed he was Jewish and was slowly unearthing a mystery that would prove it.

Ilan is drawn to her story and slowly gets pulled into an ever-widening mystery.

Rolando, he learns, was obsessed with the history of Luis de Carvajal, a 16th-century Spanish man who learned of his Jewish ancestry, and started the Crypto-Jewish community in Santa Fe, before being killed during the Inquisition.

Ilan learns that before he died Rolando was in possession of some secret documents that could shed light on the history of New Mexico's Crypto-Jewish community.

With the help of Rolando's Spanglish-speaking cousin, Ilan tries to trek down these documents, all the while being thwarted by hecklers, detectives, priests and a rival academic.

Illustrated by Steve Sheinkin of the popular Rabbi Harvey graphic novels, El Illuminado is a quirky tale with enough conspiracy, church history and secret documents to fill a Dan Brown novel. At the same time, it illuminates the little-known true history of New Mexico's Jewish past.

In his final work before he died in 2010, Harvey Pekar also used himself as the protagonist of his graphic novel, Pages from Not the Israel My Parents Promised Me (left) and El Illuminado.

Not the Israel My Parents Promised Me (D&M), illustrated by JT Waldman.

Pekar was born after World War II to immigrant parents. His mother was a left-leaning secular Zionist, his father was a religious Zionist.

Not the Israel My Parents Promised Me intersperses a quick retelling of Israel's history with events from Pekar's own life, all in the form of a conversation between himself and Waldman.

It starts off with Adam and Eve, Abraham and the Canaanites, and moves swiftly through the emergence of rabbinical Judaism after the destruction of the Second Temple.

It's sort of a primer on Israeli history, touching upon Islam, Spain, the Crusades, Israel Baal Shem Tov and the Chassidim, the Enlightenment, Herzl, the world wars, the birth of the nation and the conflict with the Arabs, all the way to the present.

All you wanted to know about Israel in less than an hour.

But the retelling of Israel's history is only the setting for the real aim of the book, which is to show the events that pushed Pekar from being a devoted Zionist to an outspoken critic of Israel.

Over the course of a single day in Cleveland, Pekar (well-known for his graphic autobiography American Splendor) and Waldman wrestle with the mythologies and the realities surrounding the Jewish state. Waldman, who in his mid-30s was half Pekar's age, serves as a bit of a counterpoint to Pekar's viewpoints – or at least giving the book the feel of a debate.

Pekar's main argument is that the Arabs have a legitimate beef, something that David Ben-Gurion, the first Israeli prime minister, and Israeli military leader Moshe Dayan both admitted. "They see but one thing – we have come and we have stolen their country. Why would they accept that?" he has Ben-Gurion saying.

He is critical of the "my country right or wrong" attitude that a lot of Jews have toward the government of Israel.

For a long time, he argues, Israel was the darling of the West, especially during the 1967 and '73 wars, but all this evaporated by the 1980s. Since then, it's all been downhill for Israel in terms of world sentiment. The occupation is the main reason for this, Pekar believes.

Pekar died before this book was completed, and it was left to the illustrator and friend Waldman to finish it. Pekar's late wife, Joyce Brabner, wrote the epilogue.

The historical parts of this book offer nothing new. It's Pekar's own stories that make it interesting. Obviously, this book has a strong left-leaning bias and preaches to the choir. While it is unlikely to change people's minds, readers open to discourse will find it worth reading.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Smoskowitz gets new lease on life with the Mississauga Steelheads

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

What a difference a change of scenery can make.

Last year, Dylan Smoskowitz was riding the pine, seeing very little ice time while playing for the Barrie Colts. With a lineup of talented offensive players such as Mark Scheifele, Tanner Pearson and Smoskowitz's buddy, Daniel Erlich, Colts coach Dale Hawerchuk didn't have to rely on Smoskowitz's goal-scoring abilities.

His talents were being wasted as a spot player, so early in the current season, he was traded to the Mississauga Steelheads for Cody Boyd plus a couple of OHL draft picks.

Smoskowitz proved his mettle right from the get-go. During the first period of his first game for the Steelheads, before he'd even attended a practice, he put one by the goaltender of the Niagara IceDogs.

"I knew this would be my new home, that I'd fit in great with the coach and a great bunch of guys," he said.

In Mississauga he was told that he'd "be relied upon more offensively. At the same time, I take pride in myself as a two-way player, taking faceoffs. And you can't forget your defensive responsibility," he said.

Always an offensively gifted player, Smoskowitz's stats tell the story of a guy who blossoms when he gets lots of ice time.

In 2010-11, his first season with the Colts, he scored 21 goals and added 10 assists in 67 games. Last year, with limited ice time, his numbers fell to three goals and nine points in 60 games.

Now, as the No. 1 centre in Mississauga, playing on the power play and despite facing the other teams' best defenders, he's racked up 21 goals and eight assists in 24 games. He's 31st in OHL scoring. He was named OHL player of the week for the week ending Oct. 14 after scoring five goals and two assists in three games, to go along with a plus-minus rating of plus-5. So far this season, his plus-minus stands at plus 11.

Smoskowitz considers himself fortunate to be getting a second chance to showcase his talents. "I'll try to make the most of the moment," he said.

He's been put on a line with Mississauga's leading scorer, Riley Brace (nine goals, 26 assists), who's 18th in league scoring, and Josh Burnside (eight goals and eight assists).

"It's been great since I first got here. We blended instantly," he said.

Smoskowitz is clearly the trigger-man on the line, and when he evaluates himself as a player, he believes his greatest strength is finding open space on the ice and seizing the opportunity for a good chance on net. He believes he's improved his skating, though there's room to increase his explosiveness in his first three steps, he said.

At away games, with the opposition enjoying last change, Smoskowitz faces some of the best defensive players in the league, including Dougie Hamilton and Scott Harrington. "I see it as a challenge," he said. "If you get points, it's a confidence booster."

For home games, head coach James Boyd is confident in his personnel and generally rolls his lines in order, Smoskowitz said.

A second home ice advantage is living right at home. Instead of billeting with local families, as many OHL players do, Smoskowitz lives with his parents, Michael and Shirley, in Richmond Hill. It gives his dad, who played a little junior A back in the day, the chance to go over game film with Dylan.

"My dad PVRs every televised game, and if he sees something, a trend starting to happen, he'll let me know," Dylan said. "My dad wants me working hard every shift."

Living at home has other benefits as well, especially at mealtime. "Every meal goes above and beyond," he said.

His parents both attend nearly all the Steelheads' home games, along with plenty of nearby away games.

Smoskowitz, 19, was passed over in his draft year, but he remains eligible for the NHL entry draft at the end of the current season. With his new profile, he's hopeful he'll get noticed by scouts.

One guy who spotted his talents is Alex Voihanski, GM of International Scouting Services (ISS). Voihanski is responsible for putting together Maccabi Canada's hockey team that will compete in next summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Smoskowitz was invited to the team tryouts last June, and a little while ago he was told he'd made the team.

"It should be a pretty good experience," said Smoskowitz, who attended United Synagogue Day School.

Another change of scenery and another chance for Smoskowitz to shine.

Israeli player fined, loses captaincy over 'Nazi' taunts

Michal Shmulovich and Sam Ser
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — The Maccabi Tel Aviv basketball team delivered a stinging punishment to its team captain last week, a day after Guy Pnini called a rival player a Nazi and said he hoped both the player and his father would develop cancer.

Pnini was stripped of his captain's title for the rest of the season and suspended indefinitely from the team, along with a team-imposed fine of 100,000 shekels (roughly $25,000), to be paid to a charitable organization, for his heckling of Hapoel Tel Aviv player Jonathan Skjöldebrand during a Dec. 2 game with Maccabi's crosstown rivals.

Throughout the game, Pnini taunted Skjöldebrand, an Israeli player with blond hair and blue eyes who is of Swedish descent, calling him a "German Nazi," "a son of a bitch" and "trash" — and wishing him "brain cancer." At one point, Pnini inched toward Skjöldebrand and whispered, "May your father die."

Skjöldebrand remained composed and ignored Pnini.

The moment was picked up by courtside cameras, which enabled lip-reading experts at a sports channel to decipher the captain's taunts. The clip was broadcast repeatedly on Israeli television and caused a stir among basketball enthusiasts.

Pundits weighed in and voiced strong opposition to Pnini's behavior.

"This was first-class hypocrisy and bullying that doesn't befit such a large sports club," wrote Zohar Israel, of Channel 2 News. "[Pnini] doesn't deserve to wear the national team's jersey, either."

A crestfallen, tearful Pnini responded to the team's castigation by conveying his "sincere apologies" to Skjöldebrand and his family, the Maccabi Tel Aviv basketball team and his fans — and to his own family and relatives, "many of whom died in the Holocaust," he said. "I apologize for my behaviour," he said. "I feel I have disappointed the league, the club, the fans and my family. I will do all that I can to make up for my mistake."

Comedian tackles difficult topics with humour

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Lahna Turner says she can find humour in any situation.

"That's one of the greatest things a comic could do," says the edgy and sometimes politically incorrect comedian. "How better to deal with horrible situations than with humour?"

The Toronto-born comedian says being a petite woman with a sweet personality means she can get away with jokes that might seem offensive coming from someone else, she says. But in a sense, it's a double-edged sword.

"On the flipside, it's also a little more shocking," she says. "If I was a brawny guy, my content wouldn't seem quite as edgy."

Turner's standup act often involves her performing jokes in the form of songs. She stands on stage, strumming her guitar and singing in her high-pitched voice about sex, race and other hot-button topics.

"I don't think there's anything you shouldn't talk about," she says, even going as far as to make jokes about explaining that she considers it part of her Jewish heritage to talk about tragedy. "If you don't talk about it, it goes away. Or if you don't talk about, it just gets worse."

She isn't scared to tease her audience. For example, in one of her most popular clips on YouTube, she sings what she calls The Stereotype Song.

"This is a special song about how stereotypes aren't true — except in Asia, Asians are bad drivers, too," she sings, singling out an Asian audience member. "It's cool, because you guys can build cars, you just can't drive them! Thanks for coming out though and be careful driving home."

Lahna

Her performance, while edgy, is not meant to offend anybody, she says, but she thinks that people have their own tastes in comedy, and she understands that not everybody will like her humour.

"You don't go to see a rock 'n' roll show if you enjoy country music," she says, adding that it's almost impossible to write a decent comedy show that doesn't touch anybody's nerves.

Turner was born in Toronto, but moved with her family to Houston, Texas, at the start of Grade 6. Having spent her early childhood in North York, she had no idea what to expect from Texas.

"I literally thought when I was a little girl that I'd be riding on a horse to school," she says.

The biggest shock, she says, was the lack of Jews in Houston. Having come from a particularly Jewish area of Toronto, she thought it was the norm.

"You move to Texas and everything changes," she says, adding that while there are Jews in Houston, the majority did not live in her part of the city. "You are very much a minority."

"The joke is that I'm Canadian and Texan, so I say, 'Howdy, eh?'"

Turner, who's 38 but says she feels like she's 26, began her comedy career 14 years ago, performing funny tunes with her guitar.

"It's very addicting, being onstage. You either love it or you hate it and will never do it again," she says. "I immediately loved it. I'm very good at writing funny comedy songs. I have a knack for it."

She spent only a few months performing for free before she received her first paycheck for her standup.

"I remember it as clear as day. The owner walked up to me and put $20 in my hand," she says. "I couldn't believe I just got paid for doing that. That was it for me. If I could get paid to do this, why would I do anything else?"

Her husband, Ralphie May, is also a comedian, best known as the runner-up in the NBC reality show Last Comic Standing. He, too, performs edgy jokes, often looking toward his own life, such as his health issues, for inspiration.

Last year, he was hospitalized and almost died, which was obviously a really difficult situation, Turner says. But then he took that experience and turned it into an hour of standup material.

"There wouldn't be a dry eye in the room, yet it is hilarious at the same time," Turner says. "I think when you have some hurt in your heart, it makes you funnier."

Her act, she says, doesn't have anything that would make people cry. "I haven't reached that level where I would feel comfortable sharing like that," she says. "I think being able to do that is a wonderful gift."

The two comedians have a five-year-old daughter and a three-year-old son. Turner says the kids don't understand the jokes yet, but she wouldn't try to hide them from it. She performed two weeks before giving birth to her daughter and two days before her son, so they've been exposed to her act since before they were born, she says.

Lahna Turner and husband Ralphie Mays run a comedy podcast called Perfect 10.

(Dabney Morris photos)

"I have a couple friends who have had babies and as women they change," she says. "The joke is they had the baby and they forget how they had the baby... That, to me, doesn't make a lot of sense."

Turner and May host a podcast together called Perfect 10, which brings fans into the couple's personal lives on a weekly basis.

Periodically, they've been asked to be the spotlight of a reality show, Turner says. They've filmed pilots before, which were not picked up. However, she says they found the experience too invasive. The podcast invites fans into their lives in a less invasive medium.

They sprinkle their kids into the show whenever it's funny, Turner says, mentioning one episode where they had relationship expert, Andrea Syrtash, council the two kids on their relationships.

"All kids are really funny," she says. "It's a refreshing way to see the world. They're a big inspiration for me now... and I work very hard to give them the greatest life imaginable."

Israel promotes water technology

How can Israel extend the way it communicates its message about its capabilities with regard to water? Is there a more effective way to help companies that have unique water-related solutions bring them forward to a market beyond Israel?

Perhaps a lesson can be taken and modified from the recent conflict between Israel and Hamas. One of the new fronts that appeared during the conflict was the use of social media by various Israeli organizations.

Israel was trying to influence a new generation of advocates by providing information in short bursts through Twitter, and then in more detail on other social-media channels and supporting videos on YouTube that gave even more details.

This "air cover" approach influenced the direction of some of the stories that eventually appeared in traditional mainstream media such as television, radio and newspapers. The information was also used by speakers at traditional rallies organized by Jewish organizations in support of Israel. The story about Israel and water could leverage some of the lessons learned in this recent conflict.

It is important that people who support Israel gain a high level understanding of what drives Israel when it comes to water. When the right opportunity presents itself with the right people, communicating a small amount of information about Israel's capabilities can open up a door of opportunity that might otherwise have remained closed.

I recently used my own network to work with a number of social-media groups on LinkedIn to track down a number of short videos that would provide air coverage about Israel and water. Through online discussions with other like-minded advocates for Israeli technology and sustainable water practices we identified a number of videos that could get a clear message across.

Israel NEWTech, Novel Efficient Water Technologies, has been responsible for making Israel's case in the cleantech space, and opening the way for Israeli companies to gain recognition and business on the world stage.

Israel - Cleantech in the Making is a two-minute YouTube video produced by Israel NEWTech. It highlights Israel's capabilities in both water and renewable energy. If you want to get a general idea about water the first minute of this video gives you that information.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

Israeli Water Technology is a five-minute video that then goes slightly deeper into Israel's water capabilities. The video provides examples of how Israeli water technology and know-how have been deployed in Israel and around the world to provide solutions for water management, water flow control, drip irrigation, recycling and reclamation, purification and water treatment and desalination.

An eight-minute video by Mekorot, Israel's National Water Company brings the story together in the context of how solutions referenced above not only plug into the national water system but serve as a research and development hub and a proving ground to help with technology and know-how export. (<http://bit.ly/Ug3tKq>)

This sets the stage for a more targeted business discussion, where you match the specific water needs of a client with the water capabilities that the Israeli companies can offer. Next month, a look at traditional water-related conferences and new collaborative approaches to bringing people together around water.

POTATO APPLE LATKES

1 tbsp olive oil • 1 lg chopped onion
• 1 egg, lightly beaten

- 4 Yukon Gold potatoes, peeled, grated, squeezed dry
- 2/3 cream cheese • 1/3 c shredded Cheddar cheese
- 2 apples, peeled, cored, grated, squeezed dry
- 2 tbsp flour • 1/2 tsp salt • 1/2 c olive oil
- 1/4 tsp freshly ground black pepper

In large nonstick frying pan, heat 1 tbsp oil over medium heat; cook onion 8-10 min. until soft. Transfer to large bowl to cool. Add egg, potatoes, apples, cream cheese, Cheddar, flour, salt, pepper. Using your hands, mix together until combined. Form mixture into 16 2 1/2" patties.

In clean large nonstick frying pan, heat 1/2 c oil over medium heat. In batches, add patties, reduce heat to medium-low; cook 5-7 min. per side until browned and cooked through. Transfer to paper towel-lined plate. Bring oil back up to medium heat between batches. Serve latkes warm with sour cream & chives.

Hebrew web columnist Yossi Tastassa says the timing of Israel's announcement last week that it plans new buildings in area E1 lacked proper thought.

Ben-Gurion University professor Smadar Cohen, left, has helped to turn plant algae into an injectable liquid polymer "device" that finds its way through the blood to a specific area of damaged heart tissue, then transforms into a gel-like material that heals that same tissue while minimizing damage.

Canada: slumbering under the snow

The Harper government is so ideologically based, so disinterested in facts, that more of our citizens and friends who need compassion are suffering.

Bill C-398, recently defeated in parliament, was supported by pharmaceutical companies, and would have made it easier for Canadian generic drug companies to produce lifesaving HIV/AIDS drugs for developing countries unable to manufacture them. The drugs will not be sent. Children will die. Canada has lost again.

The Harper government has passed laws ensuring Canada's place in the "no nonsense, take no prisoners" family of nations. Debate, the lifeblood of a democracy, is mocked, not only in the House but at the committee level, where the Canadian middle road through negotiations used to be found. It's as if the Harper government is sitting underneath a basketball net and simply tossing the ball into it. There is no need to dribble. The opposition, another Canadian voice, has been locked in its dressing room.

The Harper government has clumped together bills, under an "omnibus" banner. Bill C-10, The Safe Street and Community Act, allows it to bully its way through with minimal discussion and little reliance on experts who know more about crime than an elected official.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

When the government is asked how it can pass a law requiring minimum sentencing – a process that excludes judges' ability to determine extenuating circumstances and has shown to be a failure in places such as Texas – its response is that "that is their mandate."

Mandate indeed. Did the Conservative government run on a platform of "minimal debate"? Certainly not. Did the 35 per cent who voted for this government check off their ballot knowing Bill C-31 and refugee policy would exclude the most vulnerable from entering our country, or if they were able to stay, be refused medicine? No!

And while this happens, so many of our Jewish community members rejoice at our government's position on Israel and believe all is, therefore, just fine. A large segment of our community has become a one-value group and suspended their critical thinking and a sense of national and international brotherhood that ensures the rights and needs of the impoverished, the sick and our neighbours who have made legal mistakes and found themselves in prison for six months with rapists and murderers.

What happened to us?

I am deeply appreciative of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's stand on Israel. The argument that Israel is always under threat, and its existence is at question is, I believe, correct. I am not, however, prepared to weaken Canada through my unconditional support of our government (and its stance on Israel), because if I were to, what would be left of our compassionate nation and its ability to extend support to Canadians, our brothers and sisters in developing nations, and our Homeland, Israel? The fact that we cannot make a distinction between support of Israel and anything else is a dangerous path to be on.

An ideologically based leadership translates into an angry, one-dimensional country. This cannot auger well in the long run for anybody. The tolerant Canada that once was is sleeping under a blanket of undisturbed snow. What will be if we allow it to slumber?

On Dec. 15, the government is releasing its Designated Countries list, which will likely include Hungary, where Jews and Roma are suffering persecution. Refugees from countries on the list will be eligible only for health care deemed necessary for public health and safety. See www.doctors-forrefugeecare.ca.

Canada Post Publication Agreement #4006604

Canada and Israel expand relations

Will jointly aid developing countries

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Canada and Israel took another step forward to strengthen bilateral relations by signing an agreement to jointly foster economic and social development in the developing world.

The pact was signed last week in Ottawa by Margaret Biggs, the president of the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), and Daniel Carmon, director of Israel's Agency for International Development Cooperation (Mashav).

Under the Memorandum of Understanding on International Development Cooperation, as the accord is officially known, Canada and Israel will focus on poverty reduction, an objective consistent with the principles of sustainable development, the promotion of democracy and the protection of human rights.

The agreement institutionalizes an existing Canada-Israel project in agricultural, horticultural and water management in Ukraine and sets the stage for launching new joint projects, said Carmon in an interview.

Carmon was unable to say how many more projects Canada and Israel will work on in the future.

"But the sky is the limit," he said. "We'll talk about common interests, and each side will put on the table what it is respectively strong in."

In signing last week's agreement, the latest in a series consolidating Israel's growing relationship with Canada, Carmon noted that both nations are interested in pursuing projects in such fields as public health and the empowerment of women.

"Canada is a close and intimate friend of Israel, and this pact is an important ingredient in our bilateral relations," he added, noting Israel has similar agreements with the United States, Britain, France, Germany and Italy. "Working together, we can face, side by side, global challenges in development."

In commenting on the agreement, Canadian Minister of International Co-operation Julian Fantino said, "Canada and Israel share a bond of friendship, and we are allies in the democratic family of countries."

UJA Fed Gets Grant

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has received a $500,000 matching fund grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation's Community Capital Fund to renovate the sixth floor of the Lipa Green Centre for Jewish Community Services at 4600 Bathurst St. The federation celebrated the announcement with a plaque presentation Dec. 14 in the building's Tamari Hall with MPP David Zimmer and a foundation representative.

Cooper to Retire

TORONTO — Bank of Montreal chief economist Sherry Cooper announced her retirement last week after a 30-year career at BMO Financial Group. She plans to step down officially on Jan.

30. The U.S.-born Cooper, 62, moved to Toronto 30 years ago to become chief economist at the brokerage firm Burns Fry, which later became Nesbitt Burns, which in turn was acquired by BMO. Cooper holds a PhD from the University of Pittsburgh and has written three books.

WORLD

Hate Crimes Drop

WASHINGTON — The Anti-Defamation League welcomed a new FBI report showing a decrease in U.S. hate crimes over the past 10 years, but said there were still "far too many" such crimes. There were 6,222 hate crimes reported in 2011, according to the Dec. 10 report. The year 2000 showed slightly more than 8,000 hate crimes. The 2011 figure was a six per cent drop from 2010 and the lowest number reported since 1994. Crimes listed "anti-Jewish" as the motivation also fell, to 771 reported last year, from 1,109 in 2000. The ADL said it was "troubling" that "Jews and Jewish institutions continued to be principle targets, accounting for 63 per cent of all religion-based hate crimes in 2011."

Bogus Therapist Convicted of Sex Abuse

NEW YORK — Nechemya Weberman, a member of the Satmar chassidic community in Brooklyn, N.Y., who practised therapy without a licence, was found guilty on 59 counts of sexual abuse.

Weberman, 54, was convicted Dec. 10 by a New York State Supreme Court jury for encounters he had with a female patient when she was between ages 12 and 15. He was charged initially on 88 counts, but the number was consolidated by the judge who presided over the case.

No physical evidence was presented during the trial, effectively leaving the prosecution to make the case based on the credibility of the accuser's testimony.

The encounters started in 2007. The accuser turned 18 last week. The girl's parents sent her to Weberman, an unlicensed therapist, at the urging of her school. According to the New York Daily News, she was referred for not meeting her sect's strict modesty guidelines and asking questions about the existence of God.

In June, four Satmar men were arrested for allegedly offering her $500,000 in an attempt to silence her. And on Nov. 30, four spectators at the trial were arrested for photographing her during her testimony.

In related news, a chassidic rabbi who advocates for victims of sexual abuse in the haredi community was injured when a chemical was thrown in his face.

Rabbi Nuchem Rosenberg was walking on the street in the Williamsburg area of Brooklyn, where he lives, when a man approached him from behind, tapped him on his shoulder and threw a chemical believed to be bleach in his face. Rabbi Rosenberg, 62, was treated for burns on his face, around his eyes and in his left eye. He is expected to make a full recovery.

The rabbi runs a website and blog for sex-abuse victims, as well as a telephone hot line. He said he believes the attack was in retaliation for his support of Weberman's victim.

Israel to get its first orthopedic hospital

Canadians being asked to help contribute $10M

Andy Levy-Aizenkopf
Staff Reporter

Meir Medical Center is set to construct Israel's first fully dedicated orthopedic hospital, and it's looking to Canada for a little help.

The teaching hospital, located in Kfar Saba, just north of Tel Aviv, serves nearly one million people, Arabs and Jews, each year and is associated with the Sackler School of Medicine at Tel Aviv University.

Meir is known for its advances and excellence in the fields of cancer research, diabetes, geriatric care, pediatric care, head and neck surgery and orthopedic surgery.

However, it's the latter medical field that the centre has decided to focus on. Though other specialty hospitals exist throughout Israel, it doesn't yet have one dedicated to orthopedics.

Speaking with The C/N during a recent Edna Bar-Ratson is the director of resource development at Meir Medical Center.

fundraising trip to Canada. Edna Bar-Ratson, director of resource development at Meir Medical Center, said, "We're excited to have this new master plan [on orthopedics]. There is a growing need and... demand for this."

She said Meir is poised to provide the "full spectrum" of orthopedic care since it is already renowned for its work in orthopedics, spinal surgery and sports medicine.

According to the centre, Israel's population is expected to hit more than 9.5 million people by 2024, with an estimated 1.5 million elderly citizens.

The centre is currently roughly the size of Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre campus. It will expand once it completes construction of the planned 25,000-square-foot orthopedic building.

To do so, the centre needs to raise $60 million over the next three years to build the new pavilion. And Canadians are being asked to help contribute $10 million toward the cause.

Arie Raif, vice-chair and CEO of the Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Center, said his job is to get the Canadian Jewish and non-Jewish communities to buy into the centre's vision.

The charitable foundation has raised more than $2 million for the centre since 2010. He now has a mandate from the centre's board to come up with the first sixth of the funds from Canadians over the next three years.

The creation of a new orthopedics building, Raif said, will not only further Israel's capacity to tend to an aging population – and to all others requiring orthopedic care – but will advance the potential of shared medical knowledge between Canadian and Israeli doctors and researchers.

The Enlightenment in Europe some three centuries ago brought forth the hope that ideas and reason would finally vanquish superstition and ignorance in the affairs of humanity. In many respects, that happened.

The encouragement of free thinking gave rise to brilliant thinkers whose works led to advance after advance in diverse yet interconnected realms of human thought, attitudes and achievements: philosophy, science, medicine, industry, agriculture, arts and the humanities.

Except of course, when it came to the Jews – as Theodor Herzl discovered to his considerable chagrin, if not horror, in Paris at the trial of Alfred Dreyfus.

In every capital in Europe, in both polite and impolite intellectual circles, and especially on the street where intellect yields to hysteria, "the Jewish question" had remained somehow immune to one of the Enlightenment's chief triumphs, namely, the purging of medieval prejudices. Christian Europe's deep-seated ambivalence toward the Jews was not assuaged despite the new age of thinking, despite the facts everywhere visible before their very own eyes.

The rabid, racist, sadistic, anti-Jewish ideology of the Nazis was the extreme and grotesque culmination of that ambivalence.

And then there was a respite of sorts from that ambivalence due in large part, alas, to the profound absence of large numbers of Jews in Europe.

But that ambivalence is back.

"The Jewish question," however, has now transformed into "the Israel question." But make no mistake. It speaks the very same disquiet among a very large part of the decision-making elite of European society as did its previous iteration.

These words are not intended as a broad exculpatory swath for the poli-

From the editor's desk...

the existence of a Jewish state in the Middle East.

The European Union (EU) was incensed at the announcement two weeks ago by the Israeli government that it was planning to build more houses around Jerusalem in the E1 corridor near Ma'aleh Adumim.

But the EU was clearly not incensed, indeed judging by its reaction, it was not bothered at all, by the announcement two weeks ago by Khaled Meshal, the outgoing leader of Hamas, that his organization would never abandon its goal of annihilating the Jewish state.

After the two announcements – Israel's regarding its plan to build more homes around Jerusalem and Hamas' regarding its plan for the genocide of the people of Israel – the EU issued a statement. It was three pages long. Apart from one meagre, begrudgingly written paragraph, only part of which actually dealt with Hamas' ongoing march of murder, it was a concentrated fusillade of condemnation of Israel.

"The European Union is deeply dismayed by and strongly opposes Israel's plans to expand settlements of the government of Israel. As with all governments of all democracies, there is a great deal of room for criticism of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's policies and especially, beyond his government, of the electoral process itself that gives birth to marketplace coalitions.

But the responses of many European governments and the popular attitudes of many Europeans are quite in excess of reasonable oppositionary reactions to specific policies of the Israeli government. They foster doubts about and encourage questioning of the very propriety of in the West Bank, including in east Jerusalem, and in particular plans to develop the E1 area," the EU's Foreign Affairs Council said.

The only reference to Hamas' declaration of constant war against Israel was: "The EU finds inflammatory statements by Hamas leaders that deny Israel's right to exist unacceptable."

And even this one sentence was too much for the consciences of the EU leaders for they immediately diluted its sting by adding a generic, meaningless nostrum against terrorism without actually identifying Hamas or any of its confederates as terrorists. "The European Union will never cease its efforts to combat terrorism which seeks to undermine the openness and tolerance of societies through indiscriminate acts of violence against civilians."

Two days after the EU published its three-page statement, news surfaced that four European countries had been opposed to any condemnation of Hamas. As reported in the media, "according to Israel Radio, Denmark, Finland, Portugal and Ireland pressured European foreign ministers to condemn Israel solely for its E1 settlement construction plan." But for the intervention of Germany and the Czech Republic, there would have been no reference to Meshal's hate-filled screed.

German Foreign Minister Guido Westerwelle berated his fellow EU foreign ministers. "We absolutely condemn the statements by Hamas leader Meshal. Anyone who questions the right of Israel to exist cannot be a partner for peace talks. Meshal's public pronouncements demonstrate to the world how justified Israel's security concerns are," he said.

How ironic. At least in Germany it seems, there is less ambivalence about "the Jewish question." –MBD

Last week was an excellent one for Canadian-Israeli bilateral relations. The two countries signed agreements in two discrete realms of mutual interest and common benefit. (Please see the related story on page 1.)

It was also a good week for underprivileged peoples and developing countries around the world.

In Ottawa, the heads of the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), Margaret Biggs, and Israel's Agency for International Development Cooperation (Mashav), Daniel Carmon, signed a memorandum of understanding committing the two countries to joint projects aimed at reducing poverty, promoting democracy and protecting human rights. The two governments also signed a mutual customs pact last week and committed to joint initiatives to improve technology for the re-use of waste water. Meanwhile in Jerusalem last week, Canadian Environment Minister Peter Kent met with Israeli Minister of Energy and Water, Uzi Landau and they, too, discussed possible joint initiatives in broad environmental and water-reclamation matters.

Carmon placed in proper focus the potential for good arising from the commitment with CIDA. "Working together we can face, side-by-side, global challenges in development," he told reporters. Even more significantly, he also explained why it was so important that the two countries act together. "We have obligations as developed countries," Carmon told the Globe and Mail, "to not sit idle and see people in the developing world suffer or not get the education or the health or the most basic human rights and other rights that every human being should receive."

Carmon's articulation of these vital, moral imperatives was much overlooked last week in the din of invective directed at Israel for its announced plans to build more houses around Jerusalem.

But it is important to remember that "not sitting idle" has been the hallmark of Israel's approach in reaching out to the needy of the world since the founding of the country nearly 65 years ago. Through the Mashav program, tiny Israel has trained hundreds of thousands of people in various scientific, agricultural and humanitarian fields of self-sustenance and has responded with numerous rescue missions to places and people struck by natural disaster.

Given the shared bedrock of values on which both countries are founded, it is only natural that Israel and Canada should join forces in delivering international humanitarian aid. Minister of International Co-operation Julian Fantino noted that "Canada and Israel share a bond of friendship, and we are allies in the democratic family of countries."

If it is true as King Solomon wrote in Ecclesiastes that a cord of three ties is not quickly broken, then the bilateral future between the two countries is full of hope and optimism. Strengthening relations between Canada and Israel also strengthens the myriad possibilities for doing good in the world.

The United Church's view of Israel

The conversation between Rabbi Dow Marmur and Rev. Bruce Gregersen at Holy Blossom Temple was revealing more for what was not said than for what was ("United Church not against Israel," says official," Dec. 13). Absent from Rev. Gregersen's comments was any explanation as to why the 26-page report of the United Church of Canada on Israel/Palestine failed to make any mention of Hamas or Hezbollah. Nor did it, in singling out the issue of settlements, mention Israel's removal of every last settler from the Sinai and Gaza. As someone who attended the UCC General Council meeting and spoke to many delegates, I can personally confirm that these crucial facts of history were unknown to many UCC delegates who, when they were brought to their attention, responded with blank stares.

Absent also was any recognition on the part of Rev. Gregersen that expressing regret for asking the Palestinians to accept Israel as a Jewish state serves only to encourage the rejectionist ideology that has long plagued the Palestinian leadership.

A poll conducted by Bearing Faithful Witness (led by UCC minister Rev. Andrew Love) and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs showed that an overwhelming majority of UCC members opposed the policy positions contained in the UCC report. To that extent, I agree with the headline of the CJN article, if not with Rev. Gregersen himself. While we do not believe that the United Church at the grassroots level is disturbingly anti-Israel, we cannot say the same of the General Council itself.

Settlements don't impede peace

Has Israel Lyon of JSpaceCanada been living on a different planet from the one to which the rest of us have been assigned ("West Bank construction," letter, Dec. 13)? The announcement of 3,000 additional homes to be built in the West Bank came after Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas repeatedly refused to negotiate peace, after Palestinians resorted to endless violence leading to the recent war in Gaza and after Abbas went running to the United Nations to get the Palestinian Authority non-member observer status.

Perhaps Lyon meant to say that those things will now be even worse than before. Well, when someone has been screaming for decades that they want us dead and would prefer to die trying to kill us than live in peace with us, I would say that it cannot get any worse. And when people indiscriminately lob thousands of missiles at our children, they are not "militants," they are terrorists.

According to Lyon, simply announcing the intention to build homes in five years emboldens our enemies, but I would argue that terrorists are emboldened when Jews take up the Palestinian cause and regurgitate the lie that settlements are the biggest impediment to peace. Actually, antisemitism is the sole impediment to peace, and Jews of all political stripes need to understand that they are not responsible for the hatred directed at them and, therefore, cannot alter it by appeasing the antisemites. Jews are, however, responsible for recognizing antisemitism and for crushing it at its source.

Dysfunctional dispute management

Israel's recent decisions to expand settlement building, including housing, in the E1 zone east of Jerusalem and withhold about $100 million in Palestinian tax revenues from the Palestinian Authority are not steps toward peace. These are steps toward the extension and escalation of the ongoing conflict. The key is that the cycle of tit for tat must be broken. You give me a bloody nose, I break your legs. You break my legs, I give you a black eye. This dysfunctional process of dispute management only means more of the same, as it has since 1948. When do we say enough is enough?

Holocaust restitution a tough sell in eastern Europe

Dina Spritzer
JTA

In 1988, Yehuda Evron received a memorable letter from Lech Walesa, the first post-Communist president of Poland, on the eve of the country's transition to democracy.

"He wrote that within a few months we would get my wife's property back," recalled Evron, now 80. His wife was the only Holocaust survivor of a family that owned a residential building and factory in Zwienc that had been confiscated by the Nazis and then seized by Poland's Communist government.

Evron, a Romanian emigre and leader of the New York-based Holocaust Restitution Committee, which represents claims of thousands of survivors from Poland, chortled bitterly earlier this month when recalling his initial optimism after corresponding with Walesa. Nearly 25 years have passed, and many more survivors have died as Polish leaders have repeatedly reneged on promises to enact a restitution law to compensate for billions of dollars in property stolen from Jews and non-Jews during and after the Holocaust.

Home to more Jews than any other country before World War II, Poland is now the only European country that endured Nazi occupation that has not enacted a law to ensure some kind of private property compensation or restitution to Holocaust survivors or their heirs.

Evron was at this month's Prague meeting on Holocaust restitution, called the Immovable Property Review Conference, a follow-up to a 2009 conference in the city that produced a historic resolution on Holocaust assets. The resolution, called the 2009 Terezin Declaration, was signed by 46 countries that committed to speeding up the restitution of private and communal property to Holocaust survivors and their heirs.

This year's conference and the 2009 one were organized and supported by the Czech Foreign Ministry, U.S.-based Jewish groups and the U.S. State Department, with participation of countries throughout Europe.

At this month's gathering, many references to 2009 were in the form of laments that so little had been accomplished in three years.

"In sum, restitution of property confiscated during the Holocaust proceeds exceedingly slowly, if at all," said a report prepared for the conference by the World Jewish Restitution Organization, an umbrella group.

The focus remains on central and eastern Europe, where compensation for communal and private property seizures began in the 1990s and mostly continues at a glacial pace.

In Croatia, for example, the main progress since 2009 has been the proposal of an amendment eliminating a citizenship requirement imposed by Croatia's restitution law, but the amendment hasn't been submitted to lawmakers yet.

In Romania, all compensation to private property claimants has been suspended. Critics blame a corrupt and bankrupt compensation fund.

In Latvia, where 300 Jewish communal properties were never returned, a bill offering some compensation has been stalled for six years.

In Hungary, Prime Minister Viktor Orban has withheld the final two years of a government compensation program to aid Hungarian survivors who live outside the country.

There have been a few bright spots.

In 2011, Lithuania authorized payment of some $50 million over 10 years to the Jewish community for communal property seized by the Nazi and Soviet occupation regimes. Serbia passed a restitution bill affecting Jews and non-Jews that the Jewish community expects will eventually address Holocaust claims specifically.

Last month, the Czech Republic's lower house of Parliament approved a plan to return billions of dollars of communal property confiscated from Jews and Christians by the Communist regime. If the bill passes, the Czech Federation of Jewish Communities would receive $500,000 a year over 30 years.

The worst restitution record, conference goers said, belongs to Poland.

In 2010, Terezin Declaration signatories approved non-binding best practices such as suggesting solutions to the problem of heirless property and making the claims process more transparent and affordable. But after agreeing to the document, Poland made an abrupt about-face and withdrew its support, and Polish Foreign Minister Radoslaw Sikorski went on Polish radio in 2011 to complain of U.S. pressure on restitution issues.

Poland was the only signatory to the 2009 Terezin Declaration that didn't send a delegate to this month's conference.

Stuart Eizenstat, a former U.S. deputy treasury secretary who served as special representative of the U.S. president for Holocaust issues during the Clinton administration, said he's disappointed in Poland, but insisted it's not a lost cause.

"When I began going hat in hand to these eastern European governments in the 1990s, no one would have ever imagined we could have gotten all the agreements that are in place for the return of property,"

Eizenstat said. "In Poland, you have a process for the return of religious communal property, and that's thanks to the pressure of conferences like these."

A counsellor at the Polish Embassy in Prague, Isabella Wollejko-Chwastowicz, told JTA that a compensation law was "so complicated" that it was just taking a long time for the government to review. The explanation contradicts the latest public Polish government position that Jewish groups are demanding too much.

Baroness Ruth Deech, a property expert and member of Britain's House of Lords, said Poland's position is infuriating.

Poland's chief rabbi, New York native Michael Schudrich, countered that Poles' aversion to restitution is economic, not antisemitic.

But failing to come to agreement on a restitution bill could be more costly for Poland, restitution advocates note. Jews could press private property claims in court, and the lack of clarity on land ownership in Poland hinders economic development. In Warsaw, for example, one-third of the city's real estate was in Jewish hands before World War II, according to Eizenstat, who is still involved in restitution talks and works as a pro bono consultant to the Claims Conference.

Eizenstat said he hopes economic arguments will convince Polish officials to move ahead with restitution. Such pocketbook appeals are significant, since the West can no longer hold out admission to the European Union or NATO as an incentive, said Rabbi Andrew Baker, director of international Jewish affairs for the American Jewish Committee and a longtime restitution negotiator. Eastern European countries have already won admittance to these bodies.

If you can't prove economic self-interest, you need to convince governments to provide restitution by appealing to leaders' moral consciences, he said.

For his part, Evron continues to press his wife's case with Poland. But he doesn't have high hopes.

He bemoaned Poland's tactic of forcing claimants to spend years and thousands of dollars on court cases, where they're often asked to produce evidence destroyed during World War II. But even when they win, as in his wife's residential building claim, cases are referred to the Finance Ministry for review, Evron said.

Germany guarantees legality of ritual circumcision

JTA

BERLIN — The German parliament passed a law protecting the right of Jewish and Muslim parents to choose a ritual circumcision for their sons.

In all, 434 legislators voted Dec. 12 for the new law proposed by the federal government. There were 100 votes against, and 46 abstentions. The vote came after months of heated debate over the practice, spurred in large part by a German court ruled earlier this year that called into question the legality of ritual circumcision for children.

The vote was applauded by Dieter Graumann, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, who said in a statement that he was "pleased and relieved... The circumcision law finally brings legal security and hopefully brings this highly disastrous debate, which marked this past year, to an end."

The new law, which introduces restrictions on the practice for the first time, requires that the procedure be carried out by a medically trained and certified practitioner such as a mohel, or ritual circumciser, or by a medical professional, and that anesthetic be used if needed. For a child over six months old, the procedure must be done in a hospital.

The campaign against ritual circumcision in Germany, led by a cadre of activists and boosted by some politicians on the left, picked up steam last May after a Cologne District Court ruled that the circumcision of a Muslim minor was a criminal assault.

Graumann said in his statement that the law provided a sense of security that Jews and Muslims could continue to practise their faith in Germany. "In my view, the recent debate was also a tolerance test for our society. And I am very glad that we have passed the test."

Hail to those who know right from wrong

The debka is a vigorous Mediterranean dance, heavy on the footwork, described by www.debkafantasia.com as a "community stomping ritual" which originated with the need "to compact the dirt roofs on stone homes." Having grown up in a Zionist youth movement, seeing a debka – danced by Arabs or Jews – makes me feel nostalgic and affirms the common cultural roots that should unite Arabs and Jews more than a century into the Middle East's Zionist revolution. Unfortunately, recently, while visiting York University in Toronto, I witnessed a menacing debka, an intimidating debka, a totalitarian debka that violates the spirit of the university and illustrates one of the ongoing obstacles to Middle East peace.

I was meeting with York Hillel students on the first Canadian stop of my book tour promoting Moynihan's Moment: America's Fight Against Zionism as Racism. Even before my talk began, I witnessed what some of our students endure when I passed the offices of York's pro-Palestinian group. There, instead of a sign affirming their Palestinian national liberation movement – which would not offend me – was a poster calling Zionism – our national liberation movement – "racism." The continuing need for Palestinian nationalists – be it PA President Mahmoud Abbas at the UN or Hamas in its charter or campus groups – to spend so much energy knocking Jewish nationalism down rather than building Palestinian nationalism up perpetuates the conflict.

That violent, self-destructive, spirit, blaring music interrupted my nearly two-hour discussion, with the York Hillel heroes caught on the intellectual front lines of

in Montreal

this ideological struggle. Using super-charged loudspeakers, violating the student union building's rules, members of the Palestinian group started dancing a debka in the middle of the atrium. As they danced aggressively, menacingly, some comrades unfurled anti-Israel banners. The Jewish students watched in cold contempt, disdainful of the Palestinians' aggressiveness and dismayed by the university's failure to police public spaces effectively.

This need to negate Israel, to turn even benign cultural expressions into edgy political confrontations, is the great Palestinian tic, the pathological Palestinian Achilles heel. These moves make them feel powerful, but it is the pathetic bully's expression of insecurity. It reflects their obsession with Israel and their hatred of Jews. Their all-consuming contempt curdles the soul, individually and collectively.

These students should be dancing a debka of love not hate, a debka of affirmation not negation, a debka of democracy not totalitarianism. The very subject of my talk that day, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, the American ambassador to the UN who fought the "Zionism is racism" resolution in November 1975, identified the totalitarian mentality that sacrifices everything to achieve its maximalist goals.

It thus views students as mere tools to be used to try to negate Israel, in the same way that it views Israeli children and Palestinian children as pawns in a war to destroy the Jewish state. This totalitarian approach explains the cynical, bloodthirsty Hamas strategy of making a conscious effort to target innocent Israelis while making no effort to shield innocent Palestinians from the inevitable Israeli counterattack.

Moynihan taught that such totalitarianism must be fought dramatically, systematically and intensely. "Did I make a crisis out of this obscene resolution?"

Moynihan would bellow, responding to criticism that he picked a fight at the UN in November 1975. "Damn right I did!" That's the defiant spirit that motivates these Hillel students at York and elsewhere. That's the democratic spirit that motivates Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird and other Canadian leaders who see a lynch mob at the UN and understand that standing virtually alone is a particular badge of honour. That's the vital spirit that keeps Israel and the Zionist movement thriving, despite withering assault.

I sympathize with the Palestinian pawns whose own leaders victimize them and betray them, be they children suffering in Gaza, mothers mourning there, or students mis-educated and exploited at York and elsewhere. But my grieving heart does not short-circuit my brain or cloud my eyes. I reject the moral equivalences that we're even hearing in the American Jewish rabbinate, not just the American Jewish professoriate. And I have tremendous pride, gratitude and solidarity with the Moynihans, Harpers and York Hillel students of the world who know right from wrong and do right to fight the evil they see perverting the world, corrupting the Palestinian movement, and threatening the fulfilment of our Jewish national dreams.

We all must build the shul of the future

Earlier this month, I had the privilege of hearing Prof. Jonathan Sarna discuss the ominous subject of the demise of the synagogue. Part sociology and statistics, part finger-wagging scolding of mainstream congregations, and part funny monologue, his main message was a challenge directly to the many community leaders and rabbis I saw in the audience: shape up, or the Jews will ship out.

I, too, can list all the failures of synagogue life, as he and the other panelists did, and they are many: Singles feel pushed out. Gays and lesbians don't feel welcome. People with little kids are only interested in programming for pediatric Judaism. Empty-nesters fill the pews. Large congregations are anonymous, while small congregations burn out their few volunteers. Politics prevail over spirituality. We don't talk about God enough. We talk about God too much. There's nowhere for the marginalized to go. There's nowhere for the observant left-wingers to go. People in their 20s and 30s can't seem to get engaged, because they're all on Facebook and Twitter and don't crave real interaction. (Interestingly enough, when I – an oldtimer – went to tweet something Sarna said to my Twitter feed, I discovered to my horror that there was no Wi-Fi in the shul auditorium where the panel was being held.) And so on and so on.

There was much truth being spoken. I haven't been a congregational rabbi for 20 years, but I've been a Jew in the pew a lot. I've seen all the failings of many of our community's shuls, of all denominations. Yet I've also had some amazing and wonderful spiritual highs in synagogues. When? When my fellow congregants let go of their unrealistic and extraordinary expectations; whenever folks opened up to the spiritual nuances of Judaism and were able to let go of their "list" of what the "perfect" shul had to be for them on that particular day. When my fellow congregants were able to bring the best of themselves into the shul and share it generously with those around them, including the rabbi. When my fellow congregants stopped being consumers counting how much bang they were getting for their synagogue dues buck and starting asking, "What can I give back besides money? How can I make this a wonderful shul for others?"

I think the subject itself has two great flaws. The first is the assumption that the demise of the synagogue is fully and only the synagogue's fault, and that a truly great synagogue is impossible – unless we look at "hip" new shuls in the United States, at their success at redefining membership or dues, or their Carlebach Friday-night synapses with seven-piece bands. Without looking at what makes a great congregant, and how synagogues can nurture – even expect – that kind of member, we're only asking one side of the question. We cry a lot about the demise of the synagogue, but there's also

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein
in Toronto

the demise of the congregant, the Jew ready to serve, ready to build, ready to give and ready to create the shul of their own dreams.

The second flaw is the assumption that independent minyanim or post-denominational synagogues are the answer. Without looking at what the legitimate movements of Judaism can offer and how they can speak to us in a clear and inspirational way, and without asking and listening to those who truly have found comfort and stability in their chosen movement, there is again only one side to the conversation.

Most Jews have some sort of knowledge about the main branches of Judaism – at least they know which shuls they wouldn't be caught dead in and which organizations to ignore at fundraising times. But we're woefully ignorant of what the denominations actually teach and preach, and we just might find kindred spirits and guiding principles in those organizations.

I left 20 years in adult education to return to the congregational rabbinate. I wouldn't have done so if I thought we're doomed to boring, stale and sterile synagogues that try and be all things to all people, or only demand, uninvolved and passive congregants who complain without putting in any effort to renew their own experience and challenge their own stereotypes. We all have to share the task of rebuilding the shul of the future – with enthusiasm and passion, not out of a sense of panic and defeat.

The passing parade...

They died recently, leaving footprints in time. Robert Ledley, 86, a biomedical researcher, invented the first computerized tomography (CT) scanner, which takes cross-sectional images of any part of the human body. David Lederman, 68, an aerospace engineer, led the team that developed the first fully implantable artificial heart. Stanford Ovshinsky, 89, invented the nickel-plated hybrid battery. Leonard Lerman, 87, a molecular biologist, directed efforts to decipher DNA, the basic building block of the genetic code. Warren Winkelstein, 90, a physician, traced irrefutable connections between AIDS and male unprotected sex, smoking and cervical cancer and air pollution and chronic lung disease. Jerome Horowitz, 95, a chemist, created the AZT compound the first successful drug treatment for AIDS. Jack Tramiel, 88, a survivor of the Holocaust in Poland introduced the Commodore computer to the market place, the first personal computer to sell a million units.

Robert Ader, 79, a psychologist, was among the first to prove that mental processes affect the body's immune system, a finding that revolutionized modern medicine. Lester Breslow, 90, a public health specialist, proved that life can be improved, even extended by changes in diet and sleep and eliminating smoking. Harry Levinson, 90, a management consultant, shook up corporate America by tracing a relationship between work place conditions and emotional health.

Program unites young adults, survivors

Ilan Mester
Special to The C/JN

The Dinner of Miracles has been bringing Holocaust survivors and young adults from Toronto's Jewish community together for the past eight years.

The annual event gives guests in their 20s and 30s the opportunity to interact with survivors and hear their stories firsthand.

Each table is assigned a moderator and a Holocaust survivor, who shares his or her story with a group of young adults. Over the course of the meal, attendees get to know the survivors and ask them questions about their experiences during World War II.

Dinner of Miracles is the brainchild of Shawna Samuel and Sherri Ettedgui. Jonathan Samuel, Shawna's husband, has also been involved with the event from the beginning. He said they realized almost 10 years ago that many Holocaust survivors were passing away, and the trio felt an urgency to create an event that allows younger people to hear first-hand testimonies from survivors.

"It's not a party," he told The C/JN, adding that it's inspiring to see so many young people spend money and come out to an event that isn't a typical night out, but is important nonetheless.

This year's dinner, held at Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation in Toronto on Dec. 11, also featured special guest Rick Carrier. His name might not ring a bell to most people, but Carrier is definitely important to many of the survivors who attended the dinner. The 87-year-old war veteran accidentally stumbled on the Buchenwald concentration camp and was one of hundreds of U.S. soldiers who helped liberate thousands of prisoners.

Carrier, who was the keynote speaker at the dinner, told The C/JN that he was honoured to attend the Dinner of Miracles.

"I find it very, very rewarding because it puts me in touch with the people who are still thinking about [the Holocaust and World War II] and the people who are still dealing with it," he said. "Very few people talk about it."

Shael Rosenbaum, the chair of the Young Adult March of the Living, saw Carrier honoured in Krakow during this year's march. He told The C/JN he felt privileged to introduce the liberator to the crowd of 300 people at the dinner. He said it's extremely important for teens and young adults to learn about the Holocaust.

"I think for young adults in the Jewish community, both Sephardic and Ashkenazi, I think it is beyond important for many different reasons," he said. "One is, it's part of our history. We can identify with each other because of this terrible time in history."

"But something blossomed out of the Holocaust, and that was the State of Israel," he added.

One of Rosenbaum's goals is to make sure the dinner keeps growing. "Unfortunately, the event has shrunk a little bit for various reasons," he said. "But I hope that in years to come we can grow it because there's only so many years left that we have to speak with these survivors."

Pinchas Gutter was one of 50 or so survivors who interacted with guests at the dinner. Despite what he went through during the Holocaust, he said he remains optimistic about the world.

"I'm a great believer in diversity and tolerance. This is what I preach," he told The C/JN.

Gutter says that sharing his story is his way of promoting these ideals. He has attended the Dinner of Miracles in other years, and he's also been on both the March of the Living and the March of Remembrance and Hope, a program geared toward university-aged students of all religions and ethnic backgrounds. "I think it's very important to tell the stories," he said. "But more important is to try and propagate the human aspect of life. And also to tell the story in its entirety."

The Holocaust survivor, like many of the attendees at the event, said it's very important for children and young adults to learn about what happened because "they're the future leaders."

Media miss the big picture: the Mideast's a mess

Almost everywhere one looks today in the broader Middle East, things appear to be going from bad to worse. Instability, uncertainty and growing radicalism are the disorder of the day.

Egypt, the most populous and important Arab country, is being wracked by bitter divisions between the dominant Islamic forces of the Muslim Brotherhood and more extreme Salafists on the one hand and the minority secular liberal elements on the other. Very few speak any longer about the country's "Arab Spring." President Mohammed Morsi, who usurped state powers in order to rush through the adoption of a constitution favouring the views of the Muslim Brotherhood, whose members mainly wrote it, is turning out to be far less the pragmatic "moderate" that many in the West assumed he might be.

At a deeper level, as Michael Bell noted in a Globe and Mail opinion piece (Dec. 12), what has impaired the move to democracy in Egypt is that "the art of political compromise remains rudimentary, if not alien, to the majority." Bell's observation applies to Libya, Tunisia and indeed throughout the Arab world.

Bashar Assad loyalists show their support for the Syrian president as a civil war rages in the country.

Syria remains in the grips of a devastating civil war with no end in sight. More than 45,000 people have been killed, with thousands more, including children, arrested and tortured by President Bashar Assad's regime as it fights, with Iranian and Iranian-backed Hezbollah support, to stave off defeat. Opposition forces, many guilty of their own brutality, contain foreign jihadists and an Iraq-related Al Qaeda group whose last interest is in seeing a liberal order replace Assad's secular dictatorship. No wonder the United States, which has recently recognized the opposition coalition as the official representatives of the Syrian people, still refuses to supply the coalition with arms. In the meantime, speculation grows that the long-repressed Muslim Brotherhood could eventually dominate the country.

The spillover effect from war in Syria is causing increasing instability in Lebanon, as tensions mount between Sunni and Shia factions. Instability is also a serious concern in Jordan, which must bear the burden of absorbing thousands of Syrian refugees. In addition, Amman has been the scene of several Muslim Brotherhood-led demonstrations challenging Hashemite rule. While the kingdom's fall is far from imminent, the difficulties it faces, including rising energy and food costs, are mounting. To its east, the Iranian-influenced Iraqi government led by Nouri Maliki represents a country that's disintegrating, with only the northern Kurdish autonomous region maintaining any semblance of political and economic order. In the meantime, to the west, Turkey has been badly disrupted by the chaos and violence in Syria and the requirements of looking after the needs of tens of thousands of Syrian refugees.

Despite several rounds of economic sanctions imposed by the United Nations and others (including the United States and Canada) against Iran for its defiance of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Islamic republic is pressing ahead with a nuclear weapons program that endangers its immediate Gulf neighbours, in addition to the country Iran has repeatedly threatened to "wipe off the map" – Israel.

Iran is also busy trying to maintain its influence in the Middle East by supplying weapons, especially rockets, to its proxies and clients – Hezbollah in Lebanon, jihadis in the Sinai Peninsula, Islamic Jihad and, still to a considerable degree, Hamas in Gaza. Iran has also established its weapons supply line to the Sinai and Gaza by building factories and depots in Sudan. According to the latest reports, Iran is now building military bases there.

In his Dec. 12 New York Times column, Thomas Friedman reflected on trends in the region and wrote that the Arab nation state system is itself "cracking up."

Many journalists have done a good job covering discrete parts of a region in turmoil. But very few have stood back to look at the picture as a whole or even deal with some of the deeper systemic social and economic factors feeding the chronic discord. In effect, only the surface has been scratched.

Censoring Muhammad pics hurt freedom: Levant

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Ezra Levant contends that an almost unanimous decision by North American media not to publish controversial Danish cartoons of the prophet Muhammad in 2006 "did more to harm our culture and liberty than 9/11 itself."

The author and Sun Media newspaper columnist and TV host was speaking Dec. 4 at City Playhouse Theatre in Thornhill, at an event sponsored by Canadian Hadassah-WIZO's Hatikvah chapter. His topic for the evening was "Political Correctness and the Rise of Islamism."

Levant recalled his decision as publisher of the now-defunct Western Standard, a bi-weekly publication, to publish the cartoons. "They're news, and I'm a newspaper," he said.

Although he said he got a lot of support from Muslims and Arabs for his decision, he was the subject of an investigation by the Alberta Human Rights Commission, one of 14 such commissions in Canada.

"Of course I was guilty," Levant said. "I did something to cause someone else to feel some way."

More recently, Levant's Sept. 5 on-air rant on Sun News against Canada's Roma community prompted the Toronto Roma Community Centre to launch a hate speech complaint with Toronto police that is currently under investigation.

He likened the reaction to his publication of the Muhammad cartoons to the movie Minority Report, which featured a department of "pre-crime." Hatred and contempt are feelings, he said. "You are not normal if in your life you do not feel feelings... That's part of being a grown-up, to take those feelings and transform them into something positive."

"It's no longer acceptable to criticize Islam," he said. "We must tolerate offensive ideas."

Levant said that, rather, "The No. 1 way to fight back against radical Islam is by speaking the truth about it, by criticizing it."

"I want to know who the antisemites are - don't you?" he asked. "That way, you know who to like, who to vote for, and who to oppose."

He believes that Holocaust denial, too, provides "what the left would call a teachable moment."

"A hateful comment shouldn't be something to fear... It's a lot easier to call in the hate crime cops than to mobilize the truth about Israel, than to build a coalition with other students - Christian and Arab students. At the end of the day, not only will the country be stronger, but you will, too."

"The right not to be offended is not a real right. It's a counterfeit right. It's another way of saying 'the power to shut someone else up.' And that is my deepest grievance with these so-called human right commissions. They undermine our real human rights," he said, emphasizing the word "real."

Levant said that "liberal human rights" can be traced to post-Holocaust Jews who pushed for "censorship" laws to prosecute John Ross Taylor, a pro-Hitler "eccentric" who "made it his life's hobby to try to convince Canadians to be fascists."

Levant noted that Canada's Jewish population, numbering less than 400,000, is now outnumbered by a Muslim population of just under one million.

"You cannot pass a law just for your team," Levant said. "I think it was a disaster that we eroded freedom of speech as much as we did, but it was harmless then."

Meir Medical Center

Canadian hospitals and doctors are already engaged in numerous projects with Meir, including ongoing joint projects between researchers at the Hospital for Sick Children and the University of Western Ontario.

More initiatives with Canadian medical institutions are planned, Bar-Ratson said.

She added that the construction of the new building will have a domino effect on the rest of the Meir campus, as it will free up space currently used for orthopedics in other buildings, making room for more beds and operating rooms and for other purposes.

The building will be constructed to a new building code, under which the shell of all new infrastructures must be "bomb-resistant," she said. And there will be whole floors that double as bomb shelters, so that patients need not be moved to the basement in case of rocket attacks.

Raif said the official launch of the orthopedic hospital's fundraising campaign in Canada is set for January.

CJN writer authors French guidebook on Israel

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — It's not that often newspapers get a chance to blow their own horns these days.

But The CJN can.

Veteran CJN French-language staff writer Elias Levy has authored Comprendre Israël, the latest in a popular series of 126-page guidebooks released by Quebec-based Ulysse Inc., one of the best-known publishers of travel guides used in the French-speaking world.

Other countries in the Comprendre series include China, Cuba, Japan, Thailand, South Africa, Brazil, and of course the province of Quebec.

Ulysse released the book in September, and it's being very positively received and selling well in French-speaking nations such as France, Belgium and Switzerland.

It's also drawing attention on the World Wide Web and in Quebec, where it has been on prominent display in bookstores such as Olivieri and Renaud-Bray. As well, the book is available on major online sites, including Amazon, and as an e-book.

That suits the author fine. Levy noted in an interview that Comprendre Israël marks "the first time" a francophone Quebec publisher has released a book depicting Israel as being not just about politics, Palestinians or the peace process — although these topics are addressed in detail by Levy — but as a diverse, dynamic and pluralistic democracy rich in culture, history, creativity and, above all, overflowing with talent.

"It is one of the main reasons I was motivated to write this book," Levy said. "I was given carte blanche, which is why I accepted."

"Among average Quebecers and within many academic, cultural, political and journalistic circles, there is a profound lack of understanding, a great ignorance, about what Israel is all about."

"Israel is not just a country about a conflict. It is also about literature, and the arts, and about a 'start-up nation,' one of the leading nations in the world in developing high-tech industry."

"This in a country that did not even have television until 1968. It is an economy built by the people of Israel."

"Too many people — including many important Quebecers — simply do not know about these things."

Levy spent more than a year researching and working on Comprendre Israël, producing a book that is remarkably comprehensive for its slight size. It's partly a guidebook, but also a detailed primer on all things related to Israel.

The first chapter, for example, devotes itself to "History and Israeli Civilization" and is divided into main categories — history, religion, geography and culture — and subdivided again within each. This chapter discusses the history of Zionism, the Israeli-Arab wars and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The second chapter, "Daily Life in Israel," addresses the Israeli political system, the kibbutz, the Israel Defence Forces, national languages, education, Israel's important francophone component, communications, transportation, health care and sports.

In the next chapter, about "Israeli Society in the 21st Century," the focus is on the multi-ethnic character of Israel, Jewish holidays and rituals, Arab-Jewish relations, immigration, levels of Jewish religiosity, the treatment of gays, feminism, and Israeli cuisine and wines.

In the fourth (and last) chapter, Levy, a graduate of the Hautes Études Commerciales (HEC) business school, addresses the subject he is most knowledgeable about, namely the Israeli economy and its business climate.

It's the chapter that shows Israel in all its high-tech and entrepreneurial glory.

"It is the first chapter I wrote, because it was the easiest one," Levy said. "The history, the politics, the conflict — for me that that was more difficult, and I saved that for last. I am no 'expert' on Israel, and I was careful in every chapter to cite source material and to add a very useful bibliography that readers can use later to further their knowledge."

Because of its anticipated francophone Quebec readership, the book includes sections on the important francophone presence in Israel — comprising some 20 per cent of its population — as well as its continuing "conspicuous absence" from the group of Francophonie nations.

Levy also addresses many "common points of interest" between Quebec and Israel. These include "ententes" signed between them, as well as Israel's very successful system of integrating immigrants from dozens of countries, which could serve as a model for the Quebec.

Quebec and Israel also were a common presence at the 2008 Salon du Livre de Paris, which attracted many of Israel's most illustrious literary figures.

B.C. student to get bravery award

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

RICHMOND, B.C. — When Dean Seskin steps up to receive the Chief Constable Certificate of Merit next month, the 20-year-old student from Richmond, B.C. may well be feeling embarrassed.

"I didn't do anything out of the ordinary to deserve the award," he said of the Vancouver Police Department's highest civilian honour. "What I did was a normal act. It just seemed huge because of the situation that surrounded it."

Seskin is referring to the Stanley Cup riots in 2011, when he intervened to assist Robert MacKay, a local chef who was being beaten up by a mob of 15 assailants. Ten minutes earlier, MacKay had tried to stop the mob from looting The Bay in downtown Vancouver.

"People were surrounding me, throwing punches and kicking me," MacKay recalls. "I couldn't even open my eyes, because they were full of pepper spray."

Seskin was walking along Georgia Street, trying to get to a train station, when he heard the sound of breaking windows at The Bay. He saw MacKay try to stop the looting, and moments later saw him being forced to the ground and attacked.

Seskin and another man, Chris McLelland, made their way through the crowd to rescue MacKay.

"I could see what was going to happen, and realized I needed to get in there," he recalls.

A video posted on YouTube shows Seskin in a yellow Canucks jersey, as he and McLelland pulled people off MacKay.

Dean Seskin

"I tried to make a shield around him, because he had been sprayed by mace and couldn't protect himself," Seskin says.

They managed to drag him to safety and stayed with MacKay until his girlfriend arrived on the scene.

Seskin went home and informed his father, Darrel, that he had helped a guy who was hurt and had been sprayed with mace. A couple of days later his dad called to let him know he was on YouTube and that the video had gone viral.

"He never told me exactly what he'd done, just that he'd helped someone," Darrel says. "When I saw it on YouTube, I realized exactly what he'd done. I felt super proud that my son had made the right decision, but it could have turned out differently and incredibly dangerously for him, so I was relieved that he had done good, but had emerged unscathed as well."

Seskin's story appeared on TV and in the newspapers, coverage he still finds a bit bizarre.

"It's sickening that what I did is being called heroic," he told the Richmond News. "If other people in the crowd had put down their phones and helped, it might have been different. What I did should be normal."

MacKay, who will also receive the Certificate of Merit Jan. 9, says Seskin and McLelland "were my heroes."

"Dean definitely deserves this award, because his intervention that day was extraordinary. He jumped in knowing full well what was happening and that he was putting himself at risk."

The award is given by the Vancouver Police Board to a citizen, when, on their own initiative and in the face of actual or anticipated danger, they have assisted the police in preventing a crime or making a lifesaving attempt.

"It's the highest award for civilian bravery," says Const. Brian Montague, media relations officer for the Vancouver force. Seskin, MacKay and 25 others will receive the certificate for their various roles during the riots.

Seskin says many people did good deeds during the riot and that his was singled out because it happened to have been photographed and recorded.

His parents are proud as can be, and news of the award was on Darrel's Facebook page right away, much to Dean's chagrin.

"My parents are excited and they wanted to let people know," he says. "But I didn't really want others to find out. I don't need other people to see me getting an award. It's a personal thing and I don't need the whole world to clap for me."

Kenney lists Hungary, Slovak Republic as 'safe'

Andy Levy-Aizenkopf
Staff Reporter

Roma and Jewish groups are raising objections after Ottawa officially labelled Hungary and the Slovak Republic "safe countries" for refugees fleeing from them, because they say Ottawa is ignoring the persecution of minorities in both EU states.

Citizenship and Immigration Canada released an official list of 27 designated countries of origin (DCOs) – known as "safe countries" – late last week.

The list, which the government says will be expanded, is part of a new immigration law – Bill C-31, the Protecting Canada's Immigration System Act – that seeks to streamline the refugee application process. It came into force Dec. 15.

It's designed to provide an "initial list of countries whose citizens will have their asylum claims expedited for processing because they do not normally produce refugees," the ministry said.

Twenty-five of the 27 "safe countries" are in the European Union, including Hungary, the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic. More countries will be added over the next few months.

Since the bill's passing last June, there had been much speculation about which countries would make the list.

Many immigration lawyers and newcomer communities, particularly Canadian Roma, had feared Hungary and the Slovak Republic would be on it. The Roma contend they face growing persecution in both countries.

Jews in Hungary are also experiencing heightened antisemitism, and many are growing increasingly concerned for their safety.

Roma and Jews claim that Hungary is no longer safe for minority communities due to the rise of the neo-Nazi Jobbik party, and they note that violent attacks by paramilitary groups linked to government bodies are on the rise.

A Dec. 14 statement by Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney – who met with Roma and Jewish leaders while in Hungary in October on a fact-finding mission – defended the list.

"Designating countries is an important step towards a faster and fairer asylum system," he said. "It is remarkable that the European Union... has been the top source region for asylum claims made in Canada. What's more, virtually all EU claimants either withdraw or abandon their own claims or are rejected by the independent Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) of Canada."

The final decision on which countries make the list resides with the minister.

Repeated calls by The C/N to Kenney for his assessment of the political climate in Hungary and the safety of its Roma and Jewish communities have gone unanswered.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) said that "on balance, [we] believe that the DCO list is a net improvement to Canada's refugee system" that will help expedite "frivolous" claims.

CIJA does not consider the new immigration law analogous to the "none is too many" policy of 1930s and 1940s Canada, when Jews fleeing Nazi-occupied Europe were turned away from the country, Fogel said.

"It is important to clarify that the DCO system, while imperfect, is in no way analogous to the mistreatment by Canada of those fleeing Nazism," he added. "All refugee applicants from DCOs are allowed to land on Canadian soil and are guaranteed access to fair investigation and adjudication of their claims. If the current system were in place in the 1930s and 1940s, perhaps many more Jews would have been saved from the horrors of the Holocaust."

Gina Csanyi-Robah of Toronto's Roma Community Centre wasn't available for comment by The C/N's deadline, but in an interview with the Toronto Star, she was critical of Hungary's inclusion on the list.

"The Canadian government believes Hungary is a safe, democratic country for everybody. Everyone who spends 10 minutes on the Internet knows that's not true. The persecution of Roma is so widely documented," she said.

Reena in the News

Reena Seeks Boomer Volunteers

Reena's new Boomer Volunteer project is off to a great start. This inventive initiative develops leadership roles for the New Senior as Volunteers that are meaningful, impactful and help to build capacity in the agency. The program is meant to create a new culture that embraces the passion and expectations of this unique group of volunteers. We are acutely aware that Boomers are an invaluable resource that brings their many years of experience, expertise and maturity to our organization. We hope to capitalize on the Boomer's willingness to share their lifetime of learning to make an impact on the greater community on behalf of our population while on their quest to leave a social legacy.

In keeping with our vision of a fully inclusive community, the need for improved physical fitness for the people we support and Boomer's strong interest in their own fitness and well-being, we created a unique program which capitalizes on their own good fitness practices by facilitating partnerships with individuals with developmental disabilities to act as mentor, coach and advocate in JCCs and other fitness programs. Through these activities, the Boomer Volunteers will facilitate the health and fitness of the people Reena supports as well as act as spokespersons and advocates for an inclusive community to increase community openness and create change on a system level.

Boomer Volunteers Are Needed To Fill The Following Positions:

MARKETING AND OUTREACH COORDINATOR

Strong marketing background and communication skills required

TEAM LEADER

Strong organizational and interpersonal skills required

HEALTH AND FITNESS FACILITATORS

Understanding and commitment to fitness and a healthy lifestyle as well as ability to connect with individuals with developmental disabilities required

Volunteers will be matched with people supported by Reena to encourage, motivate and support them in their fitness activities, all overseen by a qualified Fitness Instructor. They will be offered appropriate training and immersion in our vision of full inclusion for everyone, placed in the best possible position to set an example for the rest of the community and will become ambassadors and spokespersons for inclusion.

If you are interested in learning more about this incredible opportunity for the new senior, please contact: Arlene Margolese, Manager of Volunteer Services / Faith & Cultural Services, 905-889-6484 ext. 2111 or amargolese@reena.org

Fred Waks takes the reins of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto

Community leader plans to raise awareness of vital institution

By Daniel Horowitz

It's been said that adversity breeds true leaders.

Certainly that can be said of Fred Waks who, along with Ariella Rohringer, rose to tremendous heights, exhibiting true communal leadership, when Israel came calling for our support and UJA responded by quickly organizing its 2007 Israel Emergency Campaign, which raised more than $60 million.

Now, Waks, who has been a key community contributor through a number of roles within UJA Federation and other communal organizations, is bringing his unique leadership skills to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, taking the reins of the Foundation this November from Morris Perlis.

The Foundation, UJA Federation's endowment and planned giving arm, currently has a total of $500 million in assets and planned gifts.

And it's no secret what Waks sees as his biggest challenge in his newest role.

"I want the public to have a broader awareness of the Jewish Foundation, and what we're doing," says Waks.

"There's going to be a huge transference of wealth in the next 20 years or so, and the truth is that we have to prepare the next generation to fully understand the options we offer. Unfortunately, many of the challenges facing our community have not changed, but have grown. As long as they continue to grow, we have to make sure that we have the sustainability to keep up with that growth. And the Foundation has an empirical involvement in making that happen. You can build buildings, but you then need to endow and have these buildings sustained. The Jewish Foundation is something that needs to be explained to the myriad of people who do not understand how vital it is to this community."

And when it comes to doing what he can to help the Jews of Toronto, Israel and around the world through the Jewish Foundation, Waks is ready to be shameless.

Fred Waks

Without UJA Federation acting as the glue that binds countless needs out there, I don't know where our community would be. I think what makes Jewish Toronto such an outstanding community is our involvement with, and our support for, UJA Federation."

"Fred is a tireless contributor and promoter of the Jewish community here in Toronto as well as Israel," said Richard Venn, a past chair of the Foundation, and the current Board Chair, UJA Federation. "He has assumed a greater and greater role in fundraising for the Federation as UJA's Israel Emergency Campaign Chair in 2007, and as the very successful JNF honoree in 2012. We are honoured and privileged to be the beneficiary of Fred's talents as the new chair of the UJA Federation's Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto."

"There are many philanthropic choices available to donors today, with many organizations asking for our money," explains Waks. "But, the Jewish Foundation is unique in that it is building for the future, for our children, and for our grandchildren. By making a legacy gift to the Jewish Foundation in the form of an endowment or planned gift, our community will remain strong and vibrant for generations to come. There has been great leadership at the helm of the Jewish Foundation in the past, and every leader brings something new. Fundraising is the attribute that I bring. I've been called shameless, and as long as I'm acting on behalf of a cause that I believe in, and that the community believes in, I'm quite prepared to be shameless."

Whether it's through Waks' role during the 2007 Israel Emergency Campaign, UJA Federation's Real Estate Top Gifts Division, or chairing Israel @ 60 celebrations, one thing is abundantly clear: his volunteerism is clearly a labour of love.

"I've always said that the largest single gift one should make, should be to UJA," he says. "I believe in it, my family believes in it, and my parents were involved in it before me."

Toronto's Montessori Jewish Day School is truly one of a kind

Daniel Koren

As I sat in the lobby at Montessori Jewish Day School (MJDS), waiting to be accompanied on a personalized tour by Head of School Regina Lulka, I was not quite sure what to expect from a school that abandons the traditional classroom experience for an egalitarian platform that fosters self-discipline, love of learning and an affection for Israel through arts and culture. Entering a classroom for students Grades 1-3, I was taken aback at first by what I saw.

Scanning the room, I found scattered groups of children and adults, immersed in various activities from handwriting to arts and crafts. Some children were supervised, some were not, but surprisingly, that did not seem to affect their work ethic. It became quickly apparent that the teachers at MJDS act not as authoritative figures, but as guides on a spiritual and educational journey.

MJDS is an inclusive, pluralistic institution that reaches the fundamentals of Jewish practice, integrates Hebrew and promotes a respectful environment focused on cooperation as opposed to competition. It also houses a middle school and pre-school. "At MJDS we live the values that we promote. Most schools integrate Judaic studies by having one three-hour class a day. Here, there is always a native Hebrew speaker in every classroom, teaching Jewish studies the Montessori way, through joyful learning, advanced academics, and kindling the child's flame of imagination and desire to learn," said Lulka.

As it happened to be the third day of Chanukah, there was cause for much celebration and activity. In the Grades 4-6 classroom, Cantor Eyal Bitton, equipped with his guitar, taught the story of Chanukah through song. Later, in French class, the students constructed origami dreidels and sang the same songs, in French. "Tell me that's not post-modern integration," Lulka proclaimed with a smile. Outside, I saw the Star-of-David shaped garden, where the students learn to grow their own vegetables and herbs, quite handy during Sukkot. I was also given an early screening of the students' design for next year's Sukkahville competition.

Affiliated with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Jewish Education, MJDS is the only Montessori Jewish school in Canada, providing members of Jewish Toronto with an alternative to traditional Jewish schools. "With the philosophy of Montessori we follow the child, their interests and needs, very much like the teachings of the Torah. We constantly learn through our three foci: Tanach (Torah studies), Ivrit (Hebrew), and Judaic studies," said Catherine O'Keeffe, who teaches the Grades 4-6 class.

Later, in the Grades 7-8 classroom, it became visible the kind of positive influence learning in a peaceful and loving environment has on students. A banner reading "What is important to us?" hung on the back wall. Underneath it, the students had listed six fundamentals of living that happen to be synonymous with what Jewish Toronto represents: Respect, Learning, Kindness, Peace, Hard Work, and Community.

If these are the future leaders of our community, than it seems we are heading in the right direction.

What Christmas taught me about Judaism

Rabbi Debra Stahlberg Dressler

I came to Judaism as an adult, the adopted daughter of a secular Christian family. Although my embrace of Judaism didn't create a family conflict about religious beliefs, it did challenge one supreme element of family culture: Christmas. The stakes were only heightened by the fact that I had produced the only grandchild.

It wasn't just that my mother placed a lot of emphasis on Christmas and all its trimmings. It was how well it all worked, too. It was by far the happiest and most celebratory time each year. We didn't always do family vacations so smoothly, or birthdays, or simple family time. But Christmas was something altogether different. It was elaborate and genuine. Ours was mostly Santa Claus, Rudolph, and Frosty – irredeemably secular, but Christmas was the closest thing to sacred in my childhood recollections.

So what did I, the eldest daughter, do to honour my mother's example as I began a family of my own? I discovered my Jewish roots and embraced Judaism exclusively. No Christmas. No Santa Claus. Not even a little Easter anymore. As a "new" Jew, I wasn't about to "sell out" and make Chanukah into the superlative eight-day Jewish Christmas.

"Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are the holiest days of our year," I reasoned. "Chanukah is a minor festival, after all!"

My mother never said a single thing to challenge my decision, but you could almost hear her heart shatter like a broken ornament when she came to understand that her grandchildren weren't going to celebrate her signature holiday.

Rabbinic Reflections

One of the greatest blessings of family life, however, is that children often grow up and mellow. As the years passed, we all got comfortable with each other's choices in my family. Asserting the Jewish identity I had chosen for myself and my children became less and less about how we celebrated December holidays. The winter holiday was always going to be the big gift-giving event in my family, and I accepted that for the sake of shalom bayit and kibud av v'em.

I also learned that I could visit my family during their Christmas season and not in any way undermine the Jewish identity of my now-oldest daughter, who is a day school graduate, URJ camp veteran and fluent Hebrew speaker who has visited and lived in Israel multiple times already in her 19 years.

What I finally came to understand, probably more in hindsight than in real time, was that the "Christmas" of my youth was so much more than a secularized Christian holiday. My mother's Christmas was about creating memories, sharing joy and celebrating precious years together as a family.

Memory, joy, and family are lessons that apply equally well to Chanukah. Passover and all things Jewish. And now that my mother is gone, the three-foot-long "Chanukah stocking" she made the only grandchild she ever knew is a treasured, albeit unique, Jewish family heirloom.

In a nutshell, my mother's Christmas rocked, and through it, my completely non-Jewish mother taught me more than I can ever appreciate about being a Jew.

The wonders of Tevet

Chanukah has again come and gone and we have lit our channukiyot, sung our songs, spun our dreidels and fattened up on all kinds of fried goodies. But Chanukah is a very layered holiday, and snuggled within it is the beginning of Tevet, the current Hebrew month.

Traditionally, the beginning of Tevet is the time that we commemorate the heroine Judith, who single-handedly crippled the enemy's general by decapitating him.

In African Jewish cultures, Judith is celebrated at the start of the month of Tevet, a holiday referred to as Chag Habanot – the Festival of the Daughters. During this holiday, gifts are given from mothers to daughters and grooms to their brides. Inheritances are given to daughters, and any women who are quarrelling reconcile their differences. Women gather together to dance and celebrate and go to the local synagogue to touch the Torah and pray for the health of their daughters.

This Festival of the Daughters

Midrashic Moments

Rachael Turkienicz

emphasizes the role of women in Jewish history and the importance of daughters in carrying Judaism forward in their particular way.

There is another subtle moment in Tevet that the midrash describes concerning the balance within the ocean. While we focus on women, we're also made aware of a universal balance that's occurring in Tevet. According to the midrash, Leviathan, the gigantic sea creature, surfaces to the top of the ocean and snorts and stirs up the waters. This is to stop the large fish from completely devouring the small fish.

Once a year, even the large fish are reminded that there is always a bigger fish in the sea. They retreat and the little fish gain their moment.

While Chanukah is a festival of victory and independence, it immediately leads us into Tevet, a month of correction and balance. Let us not forget how crucial women are to our destiny, the Festival of the Daughters will correct us. And let us not forget that we are part of the balance of the universe, Leviathan will remind us.

Cyber-bullying: confronting a persistent problem

Taylor Isen
Co-op Student

The Internet is a great place to blog, talk to friends and express your opinions, but it can also have a more negative side when these interactions turn ugly.

Bullying has long been a serious issue affecting both kids and adults, but cyber-bullying is a growing problem among teenagers and can be just as harmful or worse than the physical or face-to-face variety.

As dosomething.org, a website for teens and social change, notes, "The psychological and emotional outcomes of cyber-bullying are similar to real-life bullying outcomes, except for the reality that with cyber bullying there is often no escape. School ends at 3 p.m., while the Internet is available all the time."

The site adds that "90 per cent of victims will not inform a parent or trusted adult of their abuse."

It's a disturbing statistic, because the toll bullying takes on kids isn't something that will just go away if you turn off your computer or cellphone.

In some cases, the victim will have to deal with the burden for the rest of his or her life, or for a very long time if they don't get professional help, thus affecting their self-esteem and trust in themselves and other people.

Heather Weinstock, dean of students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Wallenberg Campus, said TanenbaumCHAT uses "restorative justice" to solve bullying problems.

It responds to bullying and cyber-bullying by having two older student-volunteers talk to the perpetrator and the victim separately. The volunteers then share each side of the story with both students and a teacher or Weinstock present. A dialogue usually ensues.

By going through this process, kids are often able to sort out problems peacefully, so that both students can go back to class feeling they're in a safe, caring and healthy environment.

Weinstock said TanenbaumCHAT runs an annual year-long anti-bullying program called "Creating a Caring Community."

It features many events such as workshops and guest speakers who talk about what bullying is and why it's wrong, thus giving students tools they can use against bullying both in and out of school.

She said the school also strives to make all its students feel safe, noting that the dean's office – which she said is unique to TanenbaumCHAT – is dedicated to dealing with student problems such as bullying, and that its staff is trained to help.

Writing in The CJN in March 2011, local educator Dan Goldberg examined how all Jewish schools should be dealing with the problem.

"Although schools are sometimes reluctant to acknowledge the presence of teasing or bullying – either because they are afraid it will tarnish their reputation or because they have not found a successful way of addressing it – it is a universal phenomenon," he wrote.

"A school rooted in Jewish values has a responsibility to provide a caring and nurturing environment for every one of the children who are entrusted to its care," Goldberg said.

"A Jewish school should have a Jewish soul. It should be a place where all members of the community are treated with dignity and respect. A child who excels in Hebrew, Bible and Talmud but routinely teases and embarrasses classmates has failed to receive a proper Jewish education."

Goldberg believes that the way to help stop bullying is by using the social inclusion approach (SIA). Developed by Prof. Kim John Payne, SIA focuses on educating bystanders to confront bullying when they see it taking place.

"The SIA focuses on creating a culture where students feel empowered, and where speaking up on behalf of a classmate is encouraged and supported."

As a student in a public high school myself, I believe the social inclusion approach could be very effective in school settings, but only if more schools educate their students about what bystanders should do, instead of just telling students to stand up to bullies without giving them the tools and strategies on how to act.

Online bullying is a bit of a different story, though. It's easy to be anonymous on the Internet, so sites such as Facebook should monitor what is appropriate and what isn't and make it as easy as possible for people to report incidents when they happen.

In short, the principles behind SIA and TanenbaumCHAT's approach need to be applied to online interactions, because cyber-bullying hurts and embarrasses the victim, and can even lead to mental illness if it's not handled correctly.

Depression is one possible outcome.

Research led by Jing Wang and her colleagues at the National Institutes of Health in the United States found that victims of cyber-bullying reported higher rates of depression than victims of other forms of bullying.

"Unlike traditional bullying, which usually involves a face-to-face confrontation, cyber victims may not see or identify their harasser; as such, cyber victims may be more likely to feel isolated, dehumanized or helpless at the time of the attack," they wrote in the Journal of Adolescent Health.

So even though cyber-bullying is a persistent problem, models for confronting it exist. Yet success ultimately lies with educators, social media sites and teens themselves.

It's not a problem that will go away on its own.

Taylor Isen is a student at Thornlea Secondary School. She is in a journalism co-op program at The CJN.

BAYCREST CHANUKAH: Associated Hebrew Schools' students Ezra, left, and Eva light the first candle for Chanukah during a special ceremony Dec. 7 at Baycrest's Reuben Clinch Healthy Living Community, an independent seniors' residence. The five-year-olds were part of a group of 96 senior kindergarten students visiting the community for the candlelighting, which was followed by the children singing and dancing to traditional Chanukah songs with the residents.

Seven is one of Brianne Freedman's photographs, which are on exhibit at Baycrest's student centre.

Baycrest displays student-made art

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Brianne Freedman is the first artist to exhibit her work at Baycrest as part of a new program that features art from students across the Toronto area.

Until the end of the month, visitors to Baycrest's student centre will see the fourth-year OCAD University student's photography decorating the walls.

"Her photos are a great fit for the space in terms of colour, size and content," said Aviva Babins, arts project co-ordinator for Baycrest, who said one reason Freedman was such a good fit was because she had a personal connection to Baycrest through her grandmother.

Freedman said she was thrilled to display her photos in an environment where they might have a positive effect on patients and the rest of the Baycrest community.

"I really want them to be inspired and for my artwork to bring a sense of hope into their lives, whether they're going through a difficult or busy time in their lives," she said. "to help them cope with their situations or allow them to heal and transport them into serenity or peacefulness."

She said she aims for her work to embody this sense of tranquillity, for example in one piece titled Seven. The image features dandelions, a frosted window, and an upside-down number 7, all of which she called metaphors that create a narrative, though it's up to the viewers to interpret the story individually.

"I want my artwork to be able to bring them hope and to heal and to bring joy to them," she said.

Babins said the idea behind the rotating exhibits is to represent students in a space designed for students. Some of the regular users are nursing students, psychology students and music therapy interns, she added, though anybody at Baycrest can visit and see the art.

"It's a high traffic and highly used area," she said.

Every six weeks, a new artist – or group of artists – will be featured in a mini-exhibit. Applicants must be students, and there are some criteria for the art – specifically that it must have no nudity or scenes of violence.

Ideally, the work would elicit conversation and use colour and texture that complements the fun and vibrant space, Babins said.

Freedman stood out to her not only because of her personal connection to Baycrest, but also because of her talent, she said.

"Her photography looks beautiful in the space, and I could see it when she showed me her portfolio," she said, adding that the photos are relevant, colourful, and unique, and they have an interesting narrative.

The next exhibit will be a collective show, featuring skateboard designs from an OCAD digital illustration class.

Any student is welcome to submit artwork – it doesn't matter whether art is a hobby or a focus of study, Babins said.

For more information about upcoming exhibits and to submit an application, visit www.baycrest.org and click on culture, arts and innovation.

Former Congress CEO honoured by community

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

While CEO of the Canadian Jewish Congress from 2005 to 2011, Bernie Farber helped lead the Jewish community through challenging times.

It's been nearly two years since he left the now-defunct organization – which has been replaced by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) – to pursue other paths, and earlier this month, he received the community's highest honour: the Charles "Chuck"

Zaionz Award for Jewish Communal Service.

The award is given in acknowledgement of contributions made by a Jewish community worker who effects policy change on behalf of the community and who has dedicated him or herself in service to the community.

Farber called it the "Academy Award" of the Jewish professional service in Canada, and said he was honoured to receive it in a Dec. 2 presentation at the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre hosted by CIJA.

In his acceptance speech, Farber thanked many of his former colleagues and singled out CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel, whom he thanked for his "support and understanding" and for their 25 years of work together.

"Giants like Chuck Zaionz helped shape our community. They understood, indeed embraced, what the first leaders of Canadian Jewish Congress intrinsically understood. In fact the name CJC purposely put 'Canadian' before 'Jewish' to underscore our commitment as Canadians to Jewish values of justice, human rights and the need for us as a community to stand tall, and brave adversity while understanding what it meant to defend the underdog," he said.

In an interview at his new downtown Toronto office – Farber is now employed with Gemini Power Corp., a hydro-electric developer working with First Nations, as senior vice-president of government and external relations – the former Congress leader told The CJN he has fond memories of his work in the community and of the man for whom the award is named.

"In 1984, when I first entered [Jewish] community service, Chuck took me, this wet-behind-the-ears kid, under his wing and taught me how to budget for the community," he said, joking that prior to meeting Zaionz, his greatest mathematical achievement was barely passing Grade 10 math.

"He understood that money given to any Jewish community advocacy organization, like Congress, was a sacred trust. He taught me that you count every dollar like it was your own."

Looking back, Farber said he was proud of the accomplishments he and his colleagues achieved, such as rising on neo-Nazi groups and antisemites like the Heritage Front and Ernst Zundel.

"Thanks to Congress, those guys are long gone or shadows of themselves," he said.

Asked what made him choose Jewish communal advocacy as a career path, Farber said the decision was rooted in his family history.

*I came to it with the heart of a child of Holocaust survivors.
Working with Congress just fit my heart and my will to seek justice*

"I came to it with the heart of a child of Holocaust survivors. Working with Congress just fit my heart and my will to seek justice," he said.

"What Congress achieved was remarkable. We punched above our weight and did the work we had to do."

He said despite being on the outside of communal decision-making, he still maintains close contact with the community and is often asked for advice or to consult on numerous issues.

But Farber added that he's not out of the advocacy business entirely. Now that he's working for Gemini Power Corp., owned and run by Jewish philanthropist Michael Dan, he gets to focus on justice for aboriginals.

The company helps Ontario First Nations develop hydro dams on their land for the economic betterment of their communities.

"I look at First Nations people I know, and I see them still living in ways they had nearly 100 years ago. This offends my sense of justice. Always has," he said.

"I really feel I am now doing something that can make a difference in peoples' lives."

Farber added that there is an "astoundingly similar spirituality" between the First Nations and the Jewish people.

His lifelong social activism is due to his Jewish heritage.

"Again, it's because of being a child of survivors. I came to understand that bigotry, antisemitism and racism offended my sense of justice," he said. "I experienced antisemitism [in school] and I became driven to make changes in this world."

Working with Congress, he said, allowed him to "unpack all this baggage" in the cause of good.

In his acceptance speech, Farber concluded: "I know our community remains in good hands. We face different difficulties today, yet we remain anchored in our successes of the past, which I believe gives us strength for the future. We are fortunate to be buoyed by continuing strong lay leadership."

CIJA called Farber a "proud fighter for human rights" and "a champion of inter-ethnic co-operation and social justice."

Last week, he also received the Queen's Diamond Jubilee Medal at a ceremony at Queen's Park.

Noah Pozner, 6, was youngest shooting victim

JTA

NEW YORK — A Jewish child was identified as the youngest of the 26 victims killed in the Sandy Hook Elementary School shooting massacre in Newtown, Conn.

Noah Pozner, who was a first-grader, as were all of the children killed at the school on Friday, had turned six on Nov. 20. He was to be laid to rest on Monday.

The Israeli news site Ynet reported that Noah's twin sister is also a student at Sandy Hook but survived the shooting.

Rabbi Shaul Praver of Temple Adath Israel in Newtown told NPR Weekend Edition host Scott Simon that he spent Friday, which he termed "the day from hell," consoling Noah's mother, who is a member of the synagogue.

Rabbi Praver was among the clergy, social workers and psychologists who arrived at a firehouse near the school where many of the victims and their families congregated after the shooting. On Saturday morning, Adath Israel held a community prayer service.

Rabbi Praver, who ended his NPR interview with a plea for listeners to pray for the families affected, also said that another friend of the congregation was killed.

Israeli leaders sent letters of condolence to President Barack Obama over the mass killing.

"On behalf of the people of Israel, as friends and as parents, we stand with you today in contemplation and grief over the atrocious, incomprehensible massacre of 20 children and six adults — educators — at Sandy Hook Elementary School," Israeli President Shimon Peres wrote. "No experience with death can be likened to that of a parents' loss of their child. No crime is more heinous than the killing of a child."

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu wrote in a letter sent Friday that he was "shocked and horrified by today's savage massacre of innocent children and adults" at the school.

"We in Israel have experienced such cruel acts of slaughter, and we know the shock and agony they bring," Netanyahu wrote. "I want to express my profound grief, and that of all the people in Israel, to the families that lost their loved ones. May you and the American people find the strength to overcome this unspeakable tragedy."

In a video message posted on YouTube, Netanyahu addressed the American people, saying, "The people of Israel grieve with you. I can only pray that God will give you the strength, as he has given us, to overcome the tragedy and go on, living."

Meanwhile, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said on Sunday that she would introduce a bill on the first day that Congress returns to session in January to ban the sale of assault weapons and the sale of clips of more than 10 bullets.

"I'm going to introduce it in the Senate, and the same bill will be introduced in the House," Feinstein said on NBC's Meet the Press.

Lieberman resigns

JTA

JERUSALEM — Avigdor Lieberman officially stepped down as Israel's foreign minister following his indictment for fraud and breach of trust.

Lieberman left his post as foreign minister as well as vice-prime minister on Sunday after saying two days earlier that he was stepping down.

Avigdor Lieberman

"I have committed no offence but I wish to put behind me this issue, which is what remains of many years of investigation," Lieberman said in a Dec. 14 statement.

Lieberman said he also would lift his immunity from prosecution, to which he is entitled as a member of Knesset.

On Dec. 13, Israeli Attorney General

Yehuda Weinstein closed a 12-year investigation on Lieberman, dismissing most of the charges. But he indicted Lieberman for fraud and breach of trust for advancing former ambassador to Belarus Ze'ev Ben Aryeh's position in the Foreign Ministry allegedly in exchange for information about an investigation against Lieberman being conducted in Belarus. Last spring, Ben Aryeh confessed that he had received and passed documents to Lieberman in 2008.

In his statement, Lieberman added, "I am stepping down also because I believe the citizens of Israel deserve to go to the ballot box with this thing already settled so I can resume serving the State of Israel and its citizens."

According to Ynet, Lieberman does not plan to resign as No. 2 of Halikud Beitenu — the merger of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud and the Yisrael Beitenu party headed by Lieberman.

Lieberman has said he wished for a "quick trial," but it's not known whether this could be concluded ahead of Israel's general elections scheduled for Jan. 22.

A statement by the Prime Minister's Office said that Netanyahu spoke with Lieberman "and wished he [Lieberman] would soon prove his innocence in the sole remaining issue at hand and return before long to take up a senior cabinet post."

Abbas condemns Meshal's call to jihad

Aaron Kalman
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas openly denounced anti-Israel statements made by Hamas political leader Khaled Meshal earlier this month, pointing out that Hamas had agreed in principle to the two-state solution and thus to Israel's right to exist.

The Turkish news agency Hurriyet reported Dec. 18 that at the end of a visit in Ankara, Abbas said he did not accept the idea that the State of Israel would never be recognized, including by Hamas.

"I don't agree with Khaled Meshal's statement on the non-recognition of Israel, because we in fact recognized it in 1993," Abbas told reporters in English as he wrapped up his two-day visit. "A four-article agreement between Fatah and Hamas stipulates a two-state vision. And Meshal approved of this agreement."

Tapi Livni, the head of the new Hamua party and Israel's former foreign minister, called Abbas on Dec. 13, telling him that she appreciated his rejection of Meshal's comments about Israel.

"It is important for the public to hear a message like this so they won't lose hope of a 'peace agreement,'" she said.

The Likud party chided both Abbas and Livni.

The PA leader "is playing a duplicitous game for his international political needs," the party said in a statement. "What's expected of [Abbas], who purports to be a partner for peace, is not to state the obvious about Israel's right to exist. Rather, we expect him to condemn Meshal's calls for the murder of Israelis and the destruction of Israel, but these Abbas chose to ignore."

Likud said that Livni was "quick to be drawn in by Abbas' sweet talk" and maintains a "defeatist" attitude while "burying her head in the sand."

On Dec. 8, during his first-ever visit to the Gaza Strip, which is ruled by Hamas, Meshal said: "We are not giving up any inch of Palestine. It will remain Islamic and Arab for us and nobody else. Jihad and armed resistance is the only way."

"We cannot recognize Israel's legitimacy," the Hamas leader added. "From the sea to the river, from north to south, we will not give up any part of Palestine – it is our country, our right and our homeland."

The address was harshly condemned by Israeli leaders. After Meshal's speech, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu slammed Abbas for expressing willingness to reconcile with Hamas, with which Abbas' group, Fatah, had fallen out years ago. Hamas, Netanyahu said, had once again revealed its "true face."

On Dec. 12, Israel Radio reported that four European Union member states had opposed an official condemnation of Meshal's incitement-filled speech, leading to harsh responses from Israeli leaders that Europe was being one-sided.

Denmark, Finland, Portugal and Ireland reportedly pressured European foreign ministers to condemn Israel solely for its E1 settlement construction plan at a meeting of the body's foreign council Dec. 10.

In the end, the statement included a brief rebuke of Hamas's call for Israel's destruction, after an 11th-hour intervention by Germany and the Czech Republic, the report said.

Israeli leaders decried the EU statement, with Netanyahu saying that Europe's lack of a strong condemnation of Hamas was a "deafening silence."

In related news, Abbas' PLO party Fatah adopted a new logo ahead of the party's 48th anniversary celebrations that is replete with military, violence-evoking symbols, including the barrel of a rifle and a Palestinian headscarf covering the entire territory from the Jordan river to the Mediterranean Sea, eliminating the State of Israel, Palestinian Media Watch noted last week.

The logo, published in official PA daily Al-Hayat Al-Jadidah on Dec. 10, also features other loaded images, including the Dome of the Rock on Jerusalem's Temple Mount, a white dove in shackles, and a door key symbolizing the "right of return" for Palestinian refugees and their descendants. The words on the logo read "the state and victory."

The Palestinian Authority consistently eradicates Israel's existence in its official maps in government offices, schools and the media, Palestinian Media Watch reported.

Ido Zolkovitz, an expert on Fatah at the University of Haifa's department of Middle East history and the Ezri Center, said that Fatah is directing its combative message largely at a domestic audience, in a bid to respond to rival movement Hamas' fiery rhetoric.

The number 48 is also highly symbolic, a reference to the 1948 establishment of Israel and the ensuing Palestinian nakba, or disaster. The 48th anniversary marks the day when Fatah went from clandestine to public activity by firing at an Israeli water pipe on Jan. 1, 1965.

Despite the combative spirit represented in the new logo, Zolkovitz said Abbas understands that the armed struggle has led Palestinians nowhere, and consistently speaks against it.

"There are various streams inside Fatah, and not everyone is committed to [Abbas'] hopes and aspirations," he said. "The same is true for us here in Israel, where not all politicians conform to the ideas of their party leaders."

One in four Israelis lives in poverty: report

Ben Sales
JTA

TEL AVIV — The numbers tell a consistent storyline: nearly one in four Israelis lives in poverty.

A recent report by Israel's National Insurance Institute showed that 1.8 million of Israel's eight million people live below the poverty line.

In 2011, the year for which the report was issued, more than 36 per cent of Israeli children were poor, a jump of one percentage point from the previous year. Poverty afflicts more than 400,000 Israeli families – including almost seven per cent of families with two working people.

Among developed countries, these numbers are unusually high. Israel has the second-highest poverty rate in the developed world, behind only Mexico, according to statistics from the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD).

"There's a very large segment of the Israeli population that isn't receiving tools they can use in the modern economy," said Dan Ben-David, executive director of Israel's Taub Center, a think-tank that released its State of the Nation report last month – which analyzed Israeli socioeconomic policy. "It's not only bad for them, it's also become a huge problem for the country over time. They're dragging down our productivity and growth."

Israel's relatively high poverty rate stems in large part from two sectors of the population that are especially poor: Israeli Arabs and haredi Orthodox Jews, who have poverty rates of 53 and 54 per cent, respectively. Israeli Arabs constitute about a quarter of all Israelis, while approximately 10 per cent of the country is haredi.

The Israeli government defines the poverty line as individuals who have expendable income of about $9,500 annual after taxes – which is approximately 50 per cent of the median Israeli expendable income. Exactly 24.8 per cent of Israelis, or 19.9 per cent of families, live in poverty.

A sign in Jerusalem urges passersby to help the poor.

By comparison, the United States is fourth-highest on the OECD's list, with a family poverty rate of about 17 per cent, according to the OECD's standard. 23 per cent of U.S. children live in poverty.

In Israel, poverty usually does not mean starvation. Unemployment in Israel is at six per cent, and one of the country's socialist legacies is a strong safety net for the poor, sick and elderly. Israeli economic policy has, however, turned more conservative in recent years.

Shlomo Yitzhaki, Israel's government statistician, says higher-than-average birthrates among haredi and Arab Israelis is the principal reason for their high poverty rates.

"If you look at income by family size, as the families get bigger, from five members and up, total family income gets lower," he said.

Arabs and haredim are also exempt from Israel's compulsory military service, which makes it harder for them to find work in a culture where army service often serves as a career starting point, allowing people to network and in some cases gain specialized skills.

Ben-David says Israel's problems aren't limited to minorities and that the state needs to invest in education and transportation infrastructure.

In the summer of 2011, hundreds of thousands of Israelis took to the streets to protest the high cost of living and growing wealth inequality in the country, which were seen as hurting the middle class. Though the issue has gotten a lot of attention in Israel's current election campaign, it does not dominate headlines the way it did during the 2011 protests.

Last month, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced a new commission of government ministers to streamline socioeconomic reforms. He did not specify what those reforms would be.

Ben-David said Israel's security requirements often make it hard to find enough money to address the country's other challenges. Defence spending makes up about one-fifth of the total budget, and social service spending adds up to about two-fifths.

"That we have such a high defence budget means we have to be judicious with the rest," he told JTA.

Non-profit groups have stepped in to alleviate poverty in Israel, including many managed by haredim. But Yoram Sagi Zaks, founder of the Movement for the War on Poverty in Israel, says the government still needs to take primary responsibility for helping the poor.

"The non-profits help people, but they need to supplement the state, not replace the state," Zaks said. "Poverty is not a fate. This is not something we need to get used to."

Canada, Israel strengthen bilateral relations

Israel, having successfully made the transition from developing to highly developed country, is eminently qualified to share knowledge with countries in need of assistance, Carmon observed.

Mashav, founded in 1957, has expertise in areas ranging from irrigation, desert agriculture and rural and community development to early childhood education and emergency and disaster medicine.

Since Mashav's inception, more than 270,000 people from around the world have taken its training programs.

Mashav has sent missions to 46 countries, and in response to recent earthquakes in the Caribbean and Asia, its personnel built a medical clinic in Haiti and a village in Turkey.

"Mashav has been in the forefront of Israeli diplomacy in the developing world," said Carmon, who was Israel's deputy representative at the United Nations until his most recent appointment. "Mashav has been there and is very well acknowledged and appreciated."

Carmon said the agreement he co-signed in Ottawa on Dec. 11 reflects a commitment on the part of Israel and Canada to expand bilateral ties.

Also last week, Ottawa and Jerusalem signed a mutual customs assistant agreement and decided to work together to advance technology in waste-water reuse.

The customs agreement was announced in Ottawa by Canadian Minister of Public Safety Vic Toews and Israel's ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv.

"This agreement strengthens our countries' mutual abilities to investigate and prosecute customs offences and enhance global security," Toews said in a statement.

Israel is currently Canada's fourth-largest merchandise export market in the Middle East. Since the signing of the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement 15 years ago, two-way merchandise trade has more than tripled.

In Jerusalem, meanwhile, Canadian Environment Minister Peter Kent and Israeli Minister of Energy and Water Uzi Landau discussed a number of mutually relevant matters, including environmental issues.

Nearly two years ago in Jerusalem, for example, Canadian Defence Minister Peter MacKay and his Israeli counterpart, Ehud Barak, signed a memorandum of understanding on military relations.

Ottawa tightens economic measures against Iran, IRGC

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canada tightened economic measures against Iran again last week, adding 98 more companies, individuals and entities under the Special Economic Measures Act (SEMA).

Among those added to the list include the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) and the Basij, a paramilitary offshoot of the guard corps charged with suppressing dissidents.

The Dec. 11 announcement by Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird brings the total number of those listed under SEMA's Iran provisions to 50 individuals and 433 entities since 2010.

All listed people and businesses are "subject to an assets freeze and a prohibition on economic dealings," according to the ministry.

"Canada's measures also target economic sectors that indirectly support or provide funds for Iran's nuclear program: oil and gas, mining, metals, and shipping. The amended regulations further isolate Iran from the global financial system," Baird said in a statement.

"The Iranian regime must address, with urgent and concrete action, the international community's grave concerns over its nuclear activities."

Both Canadian Jewish communal organizations and opposition parties in Parliament said while these amendments to SEMA are a necessary step in sanctioning Iran, the action doesn't go far enough.

In a statement, David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) said the Jewish community "applauds" Baird's move, but more needs to be done.

"It is crucial that Canada and the international community use every available diplomatic and economic tool to bring the Iranian regime into compliance with international law and end its illegal nuclear program," he said. "We believe that adding the IRGC as a listed terrorist entity under the Anti-terrorism Act is an important additional step Canada should take in confronting the Iranian threat."

Liberal foreign affairs critic Dominic LeBlanc and Liberal human rights critic Irwin Cotler — who has long called for the IRGC to be listed as a terrorist entity — both asked for additional actions from the government.

The IRGC is "at the epicentre of the Iranian regime's manifold threats to its citizens, namely, domestic repression and human rights abuses, state-sanctioned incitement to genocide, nuclear proliferation and support for state-sanctioned international terrorism," Cotler said.

"By failing to list the IRGC directly, this government's sanctions against the Iranian regime will not promote the meaningful change so desperately needed for the Iranian people," he added.

On CBC News Network's Power and Politics on Dec. 11, NDP foreign affairs critic Paul Dewar said while his party supports the measures, it called for this action three months ago.

CIA document says Pollard sought intel on Arabs

ITIA

WASHINGTON — CIA debriefers of Jonathan Pollard said the Israeli spy co-operated "in good faith" while in custody and that his handlers' requests were limited to intelligence on the Pakistanis, Arab states and the Soviets.

The 1987 CIA damage assessment, published for the first time in a newly declassified version by the National Security Archive, a George Washington University project, recorded Pollard as "responding in good faith to debriefers' questions."

Polygraphs "tended to confirm that his co-operation with U.S. authorities was bona fide," according to the assessment.

It also records, with confidence, the amount of intelligence that Pollard shared with Israelis, though the figure was redacted.

Both revelations undercut a key argument by figures in the national intelligence community who over the years have resisted calls to commute Pollard's sentence based partly on arguments that he and Israel withheld the extent of his espionage while he was a U.S. Navy civilian analyst.

The CIA assessment suggests that the judge who ignored a plea agreement and sentenced Pollard to life did so because Pollard and his then-wife, Anne Henderson, broke the agreement by speaking to the media and not because of secret documents suggesting that Pollard had stolen more information than is believed — another reason behind arguments opposing Pollard's release.

The document says that two of Pollard's three handlers, Aviem Sella and Joseph Yagur, "emphasized that Pollard should obtain military and technical intelligence on the Soviet Union, Arab states and Pakistan."

Rafi Eitan, another handler, wanted "dirt" on Israelis who may be passing on information to the United States, but Yagur later told Pollard that such information was off limits.

Jonathan Pollard
[File photo]

The document does not specifically address reports that Pollard shared information on U.S. agents with his Israeli handlers, but it does say that Pollard did not share, nor did the Israelis seek, the most sensitive information at hand.

"The Israelis did not request or receive from Pollard intelligence concerning some of the most sensitive U.S. national security resources," the document says.

"The Israelis never expressed interest in U.S. military activities, plans, capabilities or equipment. Likewise, they did not ask for intelligence on U.S. communications per se."

A bipartisan slate of 42 U.S. House of Representatives members, backed by the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations last week urged U.S. President Barack Obama to commute Pollard's sentence, the latest of many such pleas since the mid-1990s.

Israeli firm markets product from Winnipeg

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — As often happens in life, Michel Aziza's career has taken some unexpected turns.

Of Moroccan Jewish background, Aziza grew up in France and later ended up in Toronto. In 2002, he and his Canadian-born wife, Danita, and children relocated to Winnipeg when he was offered the senior position of head of engineering at bus manufacturer New Flyer Industries.

But Aziza had always dreamed about living in Israel. Four years ago, he and his family realized that dream when he took a very early retirement and the family made aliyah.

This past summer, however, Aziza came back to Winnipeg as North American point man — in partnership with Hans Peper, Aziza's co-worker from his New Flyer days — for Traffilog, a new to North America Israeli high-tech product. Aziza's wife, Danita is in charge of marketing and communications.

Traffilog promises to improve fuel economy for fleet vehicles — trucks, buses, taxis and utility company vehicles — and to improve driver safety and performance.

As with most new Israeli technology, Traffilog grew out of an Israel Defence Force need. Aziza said the IDF was finding that accident rates among younger drivers were 50 per cent higher than the rest of the drivers. The IDF was looking for a way to reduce the accident rate among younger draftees. Israeli businessmen Robert Izraeli, a former IDF lieutenant-colonel in the logistics division, and Adi Amihai came up with Traffilog to solve the problem.

Traffilog is an Internet- and cellular-based telematics system consisting of a central processing unit and a modem that can be mounted under the dash of a vehicle. The system provides real-time monitoring of driver safety and driving style, as well as fuel consumption, vehicle performance and vehicle health. The data is analyzed on board and relayed via cellular networks to the customer's office. A communications tablet can also be mounted in the cab to give the driver access to the information. The components are all manufactured in Israel, Aziza said.

"Traffilog's system reduced the accident rate among younger IDF drivers by about 35 per cent," he said. "The system is now installed on all IDF vehicles."

"It's not just a GPS system. It tells you everything you want to know."

Izraeli and Amihai started Traffilog in 2003. Aziza connected with the company in 2009 while he was working as a consultant with the Israel Export Institute in Tel Aviv.

"Traffilog was very active in Israel and Europe and has a presence in South America," Aziza said. "The company was looking to break into the North American market. I liked the product. I knew that Hans [Peper] at New Flyer in Winnipeg was looking for a product like this. We started a development project with New Flyer. Now all buses coming out of the New Flyer factory are outfitted with the Traffilog system."

Traffilog was looking for a North American partner and distributor, and Aziza and Peper were happy to come on board. They opened for business this past September.

"For the past four months, we have been knocking on doors and talking to people about Traffilog," Aziza said. "We believe that our product is superior to what the competition offers. Our challenge is to introduce ourselves and persuade people to give our company a chance."

Peper said that Traffilog clients recoup their investment through fuel savings alone within four months. And, along with reducing accidents by 35 per cent, the system also reduces dangerous situations by up to 75 per cent.

Aziza said that Traffilog North America currently has eight pilot projects in Manitoba and Ontario, with another one expected to begin in early January. "In about six months a time, we plan to tackle the American market," he added.

He said that Traffilog's Israeli parent company is currently working on a system for private vehicles that would reduce fuel consumption and improve safety.

Michel Aziza, left, and Hans Peper are North American representatives of the Israeli high-tech product Traffilog, which promises to improve fuel economy for fleet vehicles.

Beezi — bee's knees of spelling bees

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

How well do you spell?

That's the question being asked by the makers of Beezi, the spelling game.

In the United States, spelling bees are a big deal. The granddaddy of them all is the Scripps National Spelling Bee, which is so big that it's broadcast on ESPN. It has attracted contestants from across the United States, even from New Zealand and Guam.

Luckily, you don't have to go that far to challenge yourself, friends and family to an around-the-kitchen-table spelling contest.

For the past few months, Beezi has been on retail shelves, offering enthusiasts a family-friendly way to have fun and learn something new.

It's — or is it "its"? — available in Chapters Indigo stores, where it has been selling well, according to Tony and Robyn Goldstein, the brother-and-sister team who developed the product.

Management at the bookseller's Yonge and Eglinton store have indicated Beezi has been their No. 1 selling game over the past few weeks, Tony said.

Out of their initial production run of 3,000 units, Chapters Indigo has taken nearly 2,000. The Goldsteins have been making the rounds at toy fairs, trying to create a buzz around it.

Naturally, they're (or is it their?) enthusiastic about the game.

"There's nothing quite like it in the market," said Tony.

Spelling bees are quite popular, he continued, and the game has the added benefit, in an era of social media and blogging, of improving people's spelling skills when they're writing a lot.

Plus, spelling bees are really fun, said Robyn, a teacher by training.

She traced the origin of the game back a few years to the time when she worked for her brother. The staff would gather in the company's boardroom for lunch, and to keep things interesting, Tony would challenge them to spell a word correctly.

"We had so much fun, we thought it would be a good idea to market it to the broader community," Robyn said.

They sunk about $100,000 of their own money into the product. At a little more than $30 a game, it could take some time before they begin to show a profit. But like venture capitalists everywhere, the Goldsteins are banking on another exit.

They believe the game could become another Scrabble, with the same sort of popularity and longevity enjoyed by that word game. They're hoping a big toy manufacturer acquires the game and buys them out.

But, Tony said, "first we need to create some credibility for the product, get some sales behind it."

The game consists of 2,000 words on 500 cards. "Every card includes the definition of the word, the part of speech, phonetics and origin," Robyn said.

The game is great at parties and at the cottage. "We want it to be a family game, for people to be together and not using technology," Robyn said.

Rabbi tries to reinvent Judaism in Teatron comedy

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Rabbi Sam Isaac wants to reinvent Judaism and begins with his new congregation, whose members are not at all too happy with his plans.

This is the premise of Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre's Canadian premiere of Charlie Varon's comedy Rabbi Sam.

"It is about a guy who is trying to do something with the bigger picture that he sees in his world," says Toronto actor Ron Boyd, who plays the title role.

Boyd says that the play pokes your brain and makes you think about organized religion and tradition, with the message being that the way things are done doesn't have to be the way things have to be done.

"Rabbi Sam has a vision, he has an idea of what he wants for his own experience and thinks it can be applied to everyone. He is mainly motivated by what he wants to impart to his son, and as a religious experience, tying his Judaism into himself."

Boyd says that Rabbi Sam's message about religion is that you can take elements and move forward with your own ideas and change things and make it relevant to yourself.

"I don't think that people are going to walk away and reinvent themselves completely," says Boyd. "It is not that kind of transformative event, but it does give you something to think about in the way that you approach your traditions and the way you think about religion."

Boyd says there are a lot of meaty sermon pieces full of deep thoughts in the play. "Mainly what Rabbi Sam is trying to do is to make it a magic experience and take what has happened in the community in the past and apply it to a forward-thinking movement. I like that idea, and I find that there is some resonance in having that deeper connection of where you want to be spiritually."

The actor, a divorced father of two, says that being Jewish hasn't influenced his life choices, but is a part of who he is and is present for him in every moment. He reflects by quoting a line from the play, "The deeper river which I am a part of."

Boyd says that "taking on the role of a rabbi is pretty interesting because I have to do it with respect but also bring some of me into it. It is a weird balancing thing since I am not... a rabbi."

"With any character that you create, you have to find what resonates with you in that character and then apply that on top of what you think that character should roll out as. So, I can't play him as me, because it doesn't work. I colour him with bits of me," Boyd continues.

"I think he's a lot deeper than I am, which is a good thing to plumb, to be able to put my colours on top of that spiritual drive, laser conviction and ballsy confidence... put that coat on and wear it for a while is fun to play with."

Boyd, a freelance illustrator by day, caught the acting bug a decade ago while performing with Holy Blossom Stagecraft Company. He garnered the principal role in the web-based series Star Trek New Voyages, was in an episode of CTV's Cornier Gas and in the independent film Judas Kiss.

Originally produced in the United States as a one-man play starring the playwright, Rabbi Sam, running Jan. 3 to 13 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts Studio Theatre, directed by Ari Weisberg, has a full cast joining Boyd.

Boyd previously performed for Teatron in The Dybbuk, Bluish, Kosher Lutherans, A Hamburger in a Pita, Deceived and Can I Really Date a Guy Who Wears a Yarmulke? His cast mates include Bob Cooper, Martin Edmonds, Edith Acker, Leah Charney, Julie Cohn, Arie Eigner, Brian Epstein and Marion Hirschberg.

Tickets for Rabbi Sam are available at the Toronto Centre for the Arts box office, by calling 416-781-5527 or online at www.teatrontheatre.com.

EYE ON ARTS

By BILL GLADSTONE

ANG LEE FILM LIFE OF PI PAYS HOMAGE TO TWO FINE NOVELISTS

Canadian author Yann Martel's best-selling 2001 novel Life of Pi, which won the Man Booker Prize in 2002, was said by many to be "unfilmable," but cinematic director Ang Lee proved differently by producing the charming and magical film. Currently in theatres, it has been generating mostly glowing reviews.

The story focuses on an Indian boy who becomes shipwrecked and shares a lifeboat with a Bengal tiger in the Pacific Ocean. The tiger and various other animals in the film are computer generated but appear very realistic and lifelike.

Martel deserves credit for crafting the story on which the film is based. The late Brazilian-Jewish writer Moacyr Scliar also deserves significant credit for his 1981 novel Max and the Cats, which was apparently a major influence on Martel, albeit one he has never fully acknowledged.

Max, the Jewish man who is the central character in Max and the Cats, is forced to escape Berlin in the late 1930s after his affair with a married woman is discovered. After his steamship sinks in mid-ocean, he shares a lifeboat with a jaguar, who stares menacingly at him but mysteriously forbears from eating him. Paralyzed with fear, Max catches fish to keep both himself and the jaguar alive. Eventually, the lifeboat reaches the shores of Brazil, the jaguar bounds into the forest, and Max is rescued.

Scliar died in 2011, but I had an opportunity to speak to him when he participated in the International Festival of Authors in Toronto in 2003. He said he was troubled by the evident duplication of his premise and many story points in Life of Pi, and saddened that it was controversy, rather than the fine points of Max and the Cats, that had brought his novel into the spotlight.

Max and the Cats is a memorable short novel. Those impressed with the Ang Lee film and eager to read Martel's novel should consider reading Scliar's fine work as well.

Names in the News: Israeli-bred Grammy Award-winning violinist Miri Ben-Ari, known for her pioneering fusion of classical, jazz and hip-hop styles, has been named as a "Beautiful Sound" artist and roving ambassador for the Harman Kardon Company, which designs, manufactures and markets a range of audio and related products.

Ben-Ari studied violin under the late classical master Isaac Stern and has shared the stage with Jennifer Lopez, an earlier Harman Kardon Beautiful Sound artist, as well as with Jay-Z, Wynton Marsalis, Kenny G, Janet Jackson and others. She has been dubbed the "Hip-Hop Violinist" and has performed for U.S. President Barack Obama.

Israeli pianist makes impressive TSO debut

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Israeli pianist Alon Goldstein enchanted the audience at his recent debut with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

During the evening titled Tchaikovsky Spectacular, he played the composer's Piano Concerto No. 2 with much power.

In the three movements of the concerto, Goldstein was in unison with the bassoons, clarinets, flutes and horns of the orchestra, playing in B-flat in the first movement. He was most impressive in the second movement, showcasing Tchaikovsky's composition with strong piano chords, together with the violin and cello. When the program ended, Goldstein received two standing ovations for his performance.

While signing autographs following the concert at Roy Thomson Hall, Goldstein said, "I was immersed with Tchaikovsky and enjoyed performing with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and hope we will work together again."

The 42-year-old Israeli, who lives with his wife in Bethesda, Md., was a prized pupil of piano virtuoso Leon Fleisher, at the Peabody Conservatory of Music in Baltimore, Md.

Before he studied with Fleisher, Goldstein learned to appreciate music and culture from his grandfather, a

Alon Goldstein

Holocaust survivor from Poland.

"My grandfather was my first idol, and I owe him all my love of music and appreciation of life," Goldstein said. "He told me often his many stories of survival in the Holocaust and his optimistic spirit. He was a painter, a violinist and an actor who did impressions of Charlie Chaplin. His humour, talent and love of music was passed on to me."

Goldstein was 18 when he made his debut with the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Zubin Mehta. He has played with the world's greatest orchestras, including the London Philharmonic Orchestra, and at Carnegie Hall and other prestigious venues.

Goldstein's performances of the works of Beethoven, Rachmaninoff and Tchaikovsky have been acclaimed. He's also showcased the works of contemporary classical Israeli composers such as Avner Dorman.

Goldstein is scheduled to tour around the world with the Israel Chamber Orchestra in 2013. He views himself as an Israeli ambassador of peace, preferring that the world see Israelis as having talent in the arts.

"Many people have asked how I can do music with so much talk about war and issues in the Middle East. Truthfully, I think I turned to music as a way of retreating or immersing myself away from the issues of war in Israel," Goldstein said.

"I am very proud of all that has been accomplished by all the musicians from Israel, and music can be the medium to achieve peace—I really hope so."

For more information about Goldstein, go to www.alongoldstein.com.

MONTREAL MUSEUMS OFFER WINDOWS INTO CITY HISTORY

In Lost Neighbourhoods, an exhibit at the Centre d'histoire de Montréal until September 2013, visitors may gain an appreciation of some of the local city areas bulldozed into oblivion by a transformative wave of urban renewal in Montreal in the 1950s and 1960s.

Several vanished neighbourhoods that were vanquished to make way for expressways and other large urban structures are remembered in photographs and videotaped personal testimonies in which former residents speak sadly of the impossibility of revisiting their childhood streets and homes. The exhibition, which was curated in collaboration with the City of Montreal Archives, is just one of several in Montreal's Old City that give visitors a better understanding of Montreal's long history and diverse urban fabric.

Nearby, in a vast, crypt-like space below grade, the acclaimed Pointe-à-Callière Montreal Museum of Archaeology and History presents extensive relics dating back some four centuries to the city's founding. The museum is situated on the archeologically rich Place Royale at the confluence of the St. Lawrence and Little St. Pierre rivers, where the city was founded.

But Pointe-à-Callière isn't just about Montreal history and archeology. A rare collection of Japanese Samurai costumes, swords and other artifacts is on view there through March 31. And in a newly inaugurated exhibition space in the nearby Mariners' House, The Etruscans, a thorough examination of that Mediterranean culture, was also on view when I attended (though it closed in late November).

A visit to Pointe-à-Callière's third-floor observation deck rewards the visitor with some worthy "bird's-eye" views of the old port and various churches, bridges and other landmarks.

The narrow streets of the Old City are crammed with small galleries, buzzing cafes and distinctive old buildings. It is quite easy to while away a few pleasant hours of gallery-hopping in these picturesque and antiquated surroundings, of which there is no like in Toronto. A free brochure from Montreal Tourism highlights some three dozen local galleries as well as numerous museums, restaurants and hotels in the Old City.

The area's narrow streets are usually thriving with tourists and clogged with vehicular traffic including the city's famous horse-carriages. Best to take the Metro (subway) here, stopping at Square-Victoria, Champ-de-Mars or Place-d'Armes stations.

On another afternoon, a friend, a Montreal native, treated me to a tour of old Jewish Montreal along "the Main" (St-Laurent Boulevard) and adjoining streets. Sites included several Mordecai Richler hangouts, Schwartz's delicatessen, Fairmont and St-Viateur bagel shops, the Bag Street shul (still in operation) and other old synagogues, even a steam bath.

I stayed at Le St-Martin Hotel (980 de Maisonneuve Blvd. W.), a stylish downtown boutique hotel well recommended to anyone who appreciates good architectural design.

• Athletes from Israel and around the world will arrive in Jerusalem next spring for the third annual Jerusalem International Marathon on March 1, 2013. Various routes of 40, 20 and 10 kilometres wind through and past the Old City, Mount Scopus and Hebrew University, Sultan's Pool, Mount Zion, the American and German Colonies and the Alrov Mamilla outdoor mall. www.jerusalem-marathon.com

• A massive synagogue from the Roman period was recently exposed during excavations at Huqoq in the Galilee. Discovered by the Israel Antiquities Authority, the synagogue boasts a unique mosaic made of tiny, coloured stone cubes including a depiction of the biblical story of Samson placing torches between the tails of foxes. Other recent archeological discoveries in Israel include a trove of 100 Crusader-era gold coins discovered in Apollonia National Park near Tel Aviv, and a 2,300-year-old port dating back to Hellenistic times in the northern seaside city of Acre.

Riveting account of early American popular music

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

For those who love the classic tunes of the so-called American songbook and particularly the timeless melodies and lyrics of George and Ira Gershwin, Michael Feinstein's new book, The Gershwins and Me: A Personal History in Twelve Songs (Simon & Schuster) is much more than heartfelt homage by an outsider or Johnny-come-lately to a remarkable musical era that is now closed.

Rather, it is a riveting personalized account of American popular music of the pre-swing era by someone who forged a unique relationship with one of its colossi — Ira Gershwin — while being easily young enough to be his grandson.

A gifted musician from Columbus, Ohio, Feinstein developed an unrelenting passion for this music from an early age. Through a string of fateful circumstances Feinstein met Ira Gershwin and his wife, Lee, in 1976. Feinstein was 20 years old at the time and had recently moved to Hollywood. At their first meeting in the Gershwin home, Lee "opened a concealed door to reveal a large walk-in closet... packed from floor to ceiling with records and all sorts of other media," and hired Feinstein to sort and catalogue the material.

Although Feinstein thereafter became a regular in the Gershwin household, it took a while for Ira to realize just how much the youngster knew about him and his brother, George, who had died tragically of a brain tumour at the height of his fame and creative powers in 1937.

One day Feinstein absent-mindedly whistled an obscure piece that Ira and George had written, a verse of Beginner's Luck, penned for Shall We Dance in 1936. "Ira was delighted to discover how much I knew about his work," Feinstein writes.

"He asked me to play the piano, and I played I Got Rhythm in the style of different composers: Beethoven, Rachmaninoff, and Strauss. He loved that, and I think it was then that we really bonded."

In addition to his role as archivist, Feinstein became a chief source of entertainment and happy distraction for the elderly, ailing lyricist.

As he laboured on the Herculean task of cataloguing the walk-in closet, Feinstein often consulted with Ira over names, dates and other obscure details.

"We'd debate about some song and he'd say, 'That was 1931,' and I'd say, 'No, that was 1930.' He'd say no, he remembered because of such and such, and I'd prove I was right, getting out a book. 'Well, you're right again,' he'd say, 'but you have an advantage over me.' 'What's that?' I said, and he answered, 'I've only lived my life. You've thoroughly researched it.'"

Through some process of sublime osmosis, Feinstein has acquired an awesome intimate knowledge of many of the popular composers of the period, as reflected, for example, in his assessment of their varied piano-playing capabilities. George Gershwin was "a far better player than his popular music peers," he writes. "Cole Porter couldn't play the piano well; Harry Warren could only play in the most basic fashion. Warren had tremendous ability when it came to conceiving musical ideas, but they happened in his head — he couldn't translate them to the keyboard." Other composers that Feinstein discusses in depth include Jerome Kern, Irving Berlin and Harold Arlen.

He also gives us excellent summaries of the histories of many famous tunes, such as I've Got a Crush On You, which was originally conceived of in a fast tempo but was slowed down dramatically into a ballad when Lee Wiley recorded it in 1939. "When Ira first heard Lee Wiley's recording, he felt thwarted and irritated, because he didn't think the lyrics worked well in a slow ballad setting," Feinstein writes. "What have they done to my song?" he said. But Ira listened to the song again, and the third time he listened to it, he decided he liked it and believed the lyrics "worked well when slowed down." Today, the slow version of the tune has been universally accepted and the faster version all but forgotten.

Each of the book's 12 chapters delivers an insightful homage to one of a dozen immortal songs and works, including The Man I Love (1924), 'S Wonderful (1927), Embraceable You (1930), Porgy and Bess (1935), and They Can't Take That Away From Me (1937).

In addition to the insightful narrative, The Gershwins and Me presents a fascinating scrapbook of original letters, musical scores, sheet music covers, photographs and other Gershwin ephemera, making it truly a volume for collectors. The book also offers a bonus CD of 12 Gershwin songs played by Feinstein, a gifted pianist and singer; however, his modern palette of jazz chords seems at odds with the musical period that the book celebrates so well.

In the aftermath of hurricane Sandy, which threatened and perhaps eradicated some of the historical landmarks of the early Jewish presence in Lower Manhattan, it seems somehow fitting that the New York University Press has just issued City of Promises: A History of the Jews of New York. Written by four authors, the three-volume boxed set relates that an earlier hurricane played a role in the history of New York Jews.

In 1654, the French ship St. Catrina heaved through the rolling waves in advance of an early-season hurricane as it carried 23 Dutch Jewish settlers from Brazil to the Dutch outpost of New Amsterdam on the small rustic island of Manhattan. A century later, there were only 250 Jews in New York, but the number had jumped to 40,000 by the 1860s. The massive waves of Jewish immigrants of the 1880s and early 1900s resulted in a Jewish population of some two million amidst the larger city population of about eight million. Each volume conveys a detailed history of each period as well as a "visual essay" of photographs.

After Weegee — Essays on Contemporary Jewish American Photographers, by Daniel Morris (Syracuse University Press), examines a range of photographic styles from the gritty documentary realism of Weegee (Arthur Fellig) to the glitzy theatricality of Annie Leibovitz. Scholarly and pedantic in tone, but still an interesting study of the works of a disparate dozen American camera artists who all happen to be Jewish.

Mississauga power forward works hard in draft year

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you check the stats sheet of the Mississauga Steelheads, you've got to scroll down, way down, to find Andrew Goldberg's name.

With three goals and three assists in 29 games, he's not going to challenge for the team lead in points. But in hockey, you don't have to have a scoring touch or be a set up man to be valuable to your team.

Goldberg, 18, understands his role on the Steelheads, and it's providing the characteristically Canadian lunch bucket approach to the game. He's a grinder, the guy who goes to the dirty areas, blocks shots and generally makes life miserable for the other teams' forwards.

It's a role he enjoys playing, and it's one much valued by hockey coaches across the country, whether they be junior or pro.

"I'm a hard-working forward, getting on the puck, driving to the net, making it harder for your opponents," he said in evaluating his own game.

At 5-11, 199 pounds, Goldberg is entering into power forward territory, which suits him just fine. "I like the rough going," he said.

Goldberg is a hard-worker on a team that prides itself on its work ethic. And like lots of elite players of his generation, he's made hockey a 12-month endeavour. He's on the ice almost every day, and this past summer he attended Gary Roberts High Performance Centre, itself an eye-opening experience. It put him in pretty auspicious company, sharing workouts with a boatload of NHLers, among them Steven Stamkos, Cody Hodgson and Jeff Skinner.

"Seeing their work ethic" was very impressive, he said.

It motivated him to continue working hard, particularly on one part of his game that could stand some improvement, his "explosiveness" – the first few steps he takes from a stationary position.

Born in November 1994, Goldberg is now in his draft year, and like other guys who play major junior hockey, he hopes to be selected by an NHL team.

He's received feedback from scouts that he could be penciled in as a third- or fourth-line winger. "guys who chip the puck out, do all the dirty work that nobody else wants to do."

"To go in any round would be huge," Goldberg said, but he's keeping his options open. That could mean returning to junior, signing an AHL entry-level contract or even playing in Europe.

The online OHL Prospects website had this to say about him prior to the start of the season: "With a bit of a rebuild at the forward position, he's got a chance to secure his spot after a strong year in Aurora. He's displayed his solid offensive skill set thus far in the preseason and seems to be someone to keep an eye on (he's a late birthday and thus first time eligible for the entry draft this year)."

Right now, he's taking a couple of courses in the University of Toronto's business program and commuting daily from his home in the Bathurst Street and St. Clair Avenue area to the Steelheads' rink.

Whichever direction his career goes, Goldberg is confident he'll have the backing of his family, who've supported him through all the ups and downs of a young hockey career.

"Our house is definitely a hockey house," he said.

He credits his parents, Barry and Janice, for making sacrifices to ensure he could get to games and practices and booking their vacations around his hockey schedule.

When they weren't available to take him to games, he could rely on his older brothers, Sean and Richard. "They've all impacted my competitive hockey over the last few years," he said.

"They always give me constructive criticism, even if I had a good game," he said.

Goldberg, who attended Bialik Hebrew Day School for a few years as a youngster, said he occasionally hears on-ice taunting about being Jewish, but he thinks the other players are only "trying to get me off my game. In hockey, it's chirping."

He's even been asked if he thinks his religious heritage would have an impact on where he's drafted.

"I think, if you can play, you play," he says.

UJA honours Williams for Olympic stand

Brian Williams, right, receives an award from Rick Brace, president of Bell Media's specialty channels and CTV Production.

Compiled by CJN Staff

Approximately 300 members of the GTA's Jewish community joined UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in paying tribute to veteran TSN and CTV broadcaster Brian Williams for supporting a moment of silence at the London Olympics for the 11 Israeli athletes and coaches murdered during the 1972 Munich Games.

"I'm a bit embarrassed to be honoured for doing what is simply the right thing," an emotional Williams told those in attendance about his on-air comments during the Games' opening ceremonies earlier this year.

"To me, the fact that they were ignored is because they were Israeli, and to me, a Roman Catholic, it was important for a non-Jew to take a moral stand."

The Dec. 9 tribute event was part of federation's Sports Night, which also featured sports experts Williams, ESPN's Dan Shulman and Elliott Friedman of CBC's Hockey Night in Canada, who challenged event-goers to try to stump them with sports trivia questions.

Relationship expert hosts new TV show

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Andrea Syrtash is hosting a new program on the Oprah Winfrey Network that shows how everybody can relate to one another through sharing life experiences.

"We've all suffered through loss, and we've all celebrated triumphs," she said.

On the show, Life Story Project, which she co-hosts with Toronto-based psychotherapist Dale Curd, she sits on a couch that is placed in busy locations throughout the city, including parks and bustling street corners. They invite strangers walking by to join them on the couch to talk about events that affected their lives.

The first episode, which airs Jan. 2, features stories about falling in love and heartbreak.

From that episode, there's one story that stood out in Syrtash's mind. It was about a young mother of two who lost her husband to cancer. However, before he died, not a day went by when they didn't express their love.

"Her story was incredibly compelling because she really presented it as a love story more than a broken-heart story," Syrtash said. "She calls her story a fairy tale even though she lost her prince in the end."

Another person she found unforgettable was a firefighter who made a mistake early in his career, she recalled. He was deeply affected and had a moment when wanted to end his life. He was in a burning building and he took off his oxygen mask, he told her, wanting his daughter to believe he died a hero.

The firefighter recovered and now shares his story with young firefighters to make sure they have support when they make a mistake, she said.

"These people were incredible people that we literally found on the street," Syrtash said. "I think really the point of the show is everybody has a story and every story matters."

The trick to finding these stories is learning to probe people and earn their trust, she said. Syrtash is both a trained life coach specializing in relationships, and a graduate of Ryerson University's radio and television arts program, so she may be the perfect host for this type of show.

Syrtash is originally from Toronto, but moved to the United States after graduation, following a man she met at a concert in California. She lived with him in San Francisco for five years, but decided to move to New York City, where she has dreamed of living since she was a child.

She said it's the energy of New Yorkers that really attracts her, specifically their drive and risk-taking spirit.

"My heart still has a place [in Toronto] but this city just gets under my skin," she said.

Since 2004, she has been featured on various news and entertainment networks as a relationship expert and advice columnist, and she has written two relationship self-help books. Her latest one, Cheat On Your Husband

(With Your Husband), aims to help readers create more exciting and fulfilling relationships with their spouses.

She said all of her work is based on research, which she credits to her training as a journalist. Her ideas come from case studies and interviews, rather than simply through personal experience.

Her journey from life coach to TV host grew organically from her career as a life coach, she said.

"I was passionate and I loved it," she said. "I wasn't trying to build a platform."

Nowadays, it's much harder to brand yourself, she said, adding that she's lucky to have built her own brand before Facebook, Tumblr and other social media sites became popular.

"The Internet is not where I created my brand," she said. "It grew from the Internet, but it started with my books and radio appearances and workshops."

The Internet has brought changes to the dating world, she said. For example, while online dating has become hugely popular and successful, it also has led to new issues.

"Until the end of time, we will want to be with someone who makes us our best and sees us for who we are and all of that," she said. "[But] when it comes to today, there are issues today because of technology."

Specifically, people sometimes have trouble balancing their online and offline dating lives.

"It's just about going out there, and if online helps you get out there more, great, but you have to balance it with real-world interactions," she said, adding that singles should form platonic friendships with other singles, since it gives each person a wider network to meet people.

Syrtash said she has always been interested in relationships, and even spent a year studying Middle East relations while on an exchange program at Hebrew University of Jerusalem in Israel.

She said her father is a Holocaust survivor who taught her the value of taking risks. "He really built something from nothing, so that's inspiring to me," she added.

Regarding dating within one's own religion, she said each person must figure out their own values. One of her books discusses dating outside of your "type," and in her upcoming book about debunking dating rules, she makes the case to quiet everybody else's "shoulds" in favour of your own "wants."

"I don't want to impose my value system on someone I don't really know," she said, explaining that everybody has their own ideas of what makes them happy – some people have open marriages, for example, and some people never want to get married.

Syrtash is critical of the advice many relationship experts offer in the media. She hopes to change the industry through offering positive advice.

As an example of what's wrong, she said sometimes relationship experts might tell someone they have to be engaged within a year or they should break up. "It leads people to make inauthentic choices in fear and scarcity. I don't think it's empowering," she said.

She hopes to challenge conventional wisdom, such as the idea that you should go for your type. If it's not working out, try another type, she said.

Ultimately, Syrtash said she hopes her career will continue to grow organically, and she plans to follow wherever it takes her.

"I want to do stuff I haven't heard of yet," she said, adding that maybe technology will take her on an interesting career path. "I want to do this on a bigger scale because I'm so passionate about it."

Life Story Project premieres on Jan. 2 at 9 p.m. on the Oprah Winfrey Network for two back-to-back episodes.

Stop the fighting!

Put my kids together in the family van and you can be sure of one thing: there will be fighting.

It starts with who gets to sit where and continues endlessly with laments about who kicked who, who said a rude word and how unjust life is, given that one kid has a book or pencil or toy or game that another does not.

"Be nice!" my three-year-old will yell from her car seat, echoing the phrases she often hears from her mother's mouth in these noisy, argumentative situations.

The words fall on deaf ears and the fighting continues. Sometimes I'm able to block it out completely, but usually I reach a breaking point, at which time I threaten loudly, in what I hope is a fear-inducing voice, that someone will need to walk home if I don't get silence.

The fighting gets me thinking, though. Will they argue like this when I'm six feet under?

My sister and I tore our family life into chaos with our bickering as children, and no reasoning or trips to counsellors could get us to change our behaviour. Our relationship showed no growth until we ourselves grew up, at which point we finally realized we had more in common than the differences that had seemed to separate us. Our deepening friendship has been a source of solace in times both good and bad, but I could never have anticipated it would be so in our teenage years, when we fostered an intense dislike for one another, spitting sharp exchanges devoid of love or concern.

I suspect the same will happen for my four kids, and I hope that one day, when they're adults, they'll meet for family brunches, celebrate Passover seders together and watch each other's children grow with love, involvement and understanding. I've heard anecdotally that in the absence of their parents, they look after and support each other. In the company of friends and other family members, their behaviour is impeccable, and if you met them yourself, you'd likely comment that they're well-mannered kids.

But when they're in the minivan, they reveal their ugliest sides, usually on long car trips when they frazzle their parents' nerves with slews of insults until the air is tense with animosity and the family outing is all but ruined.

Around me there are plenty of examples of adults whose sibling rivalry failed to subside. Instead, it simmers just below the surface of forced family gatherings, at best a civil tolerance defined by silence and insincerity, and at worst a refusal to have any contact whatsoever.

"Blood is thicker than water," my parents used to tell my sister and me. "One day we'll be gone, and all you'll have will be each other."

I had no conception, back then, that their words would be true.

I'm grateful for my sister's support today and can only hope my kids will learn to trust and rely on each other as she and I do now.

Because anything else boils down to petty jealousy, senseless, unresolved conflict and the banality of sheer ego and pride. And life's just too short to give those sentiments free rein.

(Aviva's take on Joseph, Jacob's son, is that he deserved the treatment he got from his brothers as he was arrogant, cocky, and wore his coat of many colours flamboyantly and with an exaggerated sense of self-possession. A colleague of mine disagreed with her and said that Joseph had passed a number of Jacob's test

CHOCOLATE GRAPES

Make (and eat) these in minutes.

Or serve them to company over the holidays.

- 1 lb. chilled seedless grapes, stems removed
- 4 oz. semisweet chocolate, melted
- 2 tbs unsweetened cocoa powder

Wash and dry grapes well; place in a large bowl. Line a large baking sheet with parchment paper. Add melted chocolate to grapes, 1 tablespoon at a time, carefully scraping down sides of the bowl and stirring through the center of the grapes so that they are evenly coated.

As the chocolate begins to set (which will be almost immediately), place cocoa powder in a small strainer and sift powder, little by little, over surface of grapes. Gently toss or stir grapes as you continue to sift until all of the grapes are well coated and separated. Spread grapes on baking sheet, cover with plastic wrap, refrigerate until chocolate has completely set, or up to 1 day.

Sharing strengths and abilities with others

Often unbeknownst to ourselves, we have stunning strengths and abilities that we can share with others. Mentoring is one way of doing that.

Recently, I began mentoring a community worker. I am enjoying the process enormously.

Aviva and I get together once a month and talk about her goals and objectives in her job and how she is pursuing them. While we don't spend a lot of time together, every moment of our interaction is valuable. It is because I give her the opportunity to mirror her professional ideas and personal vision for her future. It is because our time together gives me the chance to sharpen my listening skills, to understand what goes through the mind of another community worker who also works with lay professionals, a board, volunteers and staff.

Since we began our chavruta (learning friendship), Aviva has developed a personal mission statement that has clarified her overall objectives in life. We have discussed the children's books she loves (The Giving Tree is one of them), her love of Judaism and the Jewish People, and her weekly read of the parashat ha-shavuah – the Torah portion.

and was an upright and unwavering young man. Either way, she had a take on the Torah, and I found, as a mentor, that that was exciting and hopeful, as her Judaism clearly played a role in her leadership.)

Our weekly agenda is organized, although our back-and-forth doesn't look as if it is. Aviva and I walk. We then talk. We even sing. But throughout, we have a good sense of where we're headed.

The act of mentoring has shown me how wonderful it is to be a teacher, offering up some experience I have gained over the years, and how wonderful it is to be a student. Aviva is a very bright person, with great intuition and well-honed talents. I ask her questions about her profession and listen closely as she tells me what she has done in the Jewish community both locally and internationally, with children, teens and adults. She understands, better than I do, what makes our young people tick and the challenge of overcoming the sense of entitlement that so many of our children have. She uses the secular to explain the religious and the holy to clarify the mundane. I am her student.

Find yourself someone to mentor and give them your all. Listen closely to what they are trying to achieve and work with them to create an agenda for how their objectives can be met. Read with them, learn together and study. And most importantly, draw upon your years of experiences and share with the person you're mentoring all that worked for you, and still does, and the pitfalls to avoid.

Celebrate your past as you share, and be a colourful, provocative and riveting mentor. You might be surprised at how mentoring will help you grow and what you can do for others. It's not hard to find someone to mentor. Go online. Phone your local community organizations and offer your services, or advertise in The CJN.

Mentoring can change two lives.
